But it is not just the installation of successful systems that has kept customer's coming back to Quinte Computer.

"We are not just out to sell you a system and then go away. What is particularly critical to any of our implementations is the fact that we can effectively become a key part of your own MIS department, providing resources and suggesting solutions to virtually any issues that arise".

It is not uncommon to find QCS programmers involved in meetings on-site with customers mapping out their future and implementing their technological strategies. At any given time, QCS has programmers on their way to all areas of the world, working with customers on these strategies.

"The demand is not just within North America. We have our programmers regularly making trips to Europe, South America, Japan and Asia working with our customers on their unique requirements".

Introducing QcsOnline

Moving in sync with the times, Quinte Computer made a major announcement for local and international businesses last week, introducing QcsOnline (www.qcsonline.com) to the Quinte area.

"This latest move is so significant, that we decided to form a new company," said Quinte Computer president Jim Moore.

Citing Quinte Computer's extensive business and database expertise, QcsOnline offers a service that is "new and very exciting to the Quinte area" says Jamie Moore, President of QcsOnline. "We are able to apply 25+ years of business and systems expertise directly onto the Internet with all of the advantages that it provides."
