

FORRESTER, James (Dr.) (cont)

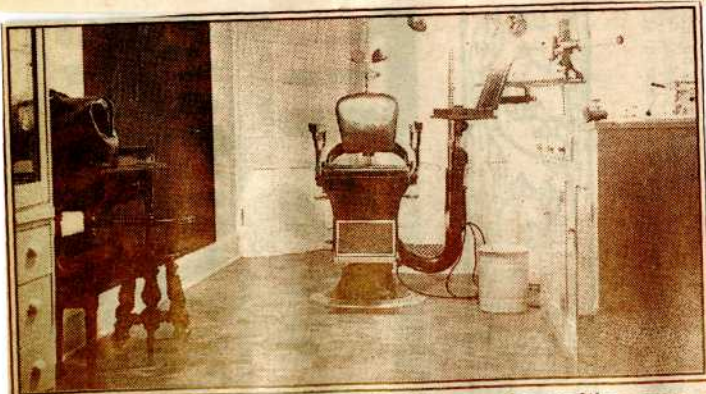

tors to examine their patients and could sometimes discover the medical problem by looking into their eyes. Even with modern technology it is an important trait for doctors today. Jane recounts an occasion when, at Fred Deacon's Belleville home, a portrait artist was showing his work and several doctors, including Forrester, were present. They began diagnosing the health of those in the portraits and the artist was "just amazed" because they were correct in several instances.

Despite long hours of work, Forrester was active in the community and sat on city council in 1958-59. Forrester retired for a brief time in the late 1960s before returning to work part-time at Trenton Memorial Hospital. He had spent over 30 years at Belleville General Hospital. He died Oct. 16, 1982, at 77.

At a blood donor clinic, Trenton, between 1942 and '45.

Top, the examination room and below, the waiting area.

Intell Remember When Jan 10/93

A caricature of the doctor.