FENIAN RIOT IN IRELAND.

A conflict has occurred between the constabulary and the Fenians, at a place called Dangan, in the County of Cork. The police, seven in number, had arrested a drunken and disorderly man during the morning, it being a fair day in the village, and some two hundred people attempted to effect his release by force. The police, however, were successful in resisting this attack, and repaired to a cabin in the vicinity with their prisoner. At this stage a young peasant, jumping on an elevated part of the ditch near, addressed the crowd, calling on them as "true Fenians" not to be afraid of a "handful of police" but to show "that they were The crowd then attacked the cottage into which the constabulary had entered, breaking the doors and windows with stones, and threatening to set fire to the house.
