HOMEWARD BOUND.
Head the ship for England!
Shake out every sail!
Blithely leap the billows, Merrily sing the gale.
Captain, work the reefing;
How many knots a day?
Round the world and home again,
That's the sailor's way.
We've traded with the Yankees, Resultants, and Chincies; We've laughed with dusky beauties In shade of high palm trees;
Across the Line and Gulf-stream—Round by Table Bay—Everywhere and home again,
That's the sailor's way!
Nighly stands the North-star Higher on our bow;
Straight we run for England;
Our thoughts are in it now.
Jolly times with friends ashore, When we've drawn our pay!
All about and home again,
That's the sailor's way!
Tom will to his parents, Jack will to his dear;
Joe to wife and children;
Bob to pipe and beer;
Dick to the dancing room;
To bear the fiddles play;
Round the world and home again,
That's the sailor's way!

FALSE LOVE AND TRUE.
"Why, but I thought you had never seen Maggie" said Bessie, opening her blue eyes very wide, and looking William full in the face.
"No—but any one can tell—I thought—" stammered William, blushing up to the brows "at that rate, she is a splendid singer."
"And that would be just the thing," said Bessie, "Stanley is so fond of music."
"Bessie!" exclaimed her brother, in a tone of great severity.
"You mean about the pudding, dear," said Bessie, as innocent as an angel, "I quite forgot your dislike to lemon. It was very thoughtful of me; but Maggie has such a fancy for this sort of pudding, and I couldn't tell that she would be out. Never mind, another time."
"You will oblige me by calling in my services when you have any lady guest in the house who needs an escort," interrupted William gravely.
"But we'll be sure that you wouldn't like to refuse," said Bessie.
"Compliments between brother and sister —wouldn't that be rather absurd, Willie?"
"There are certain courtesies—" began William, and then he stopped.
"I hope I have not failed in politeness to you," said Bessie with dignity. "I should be very glad to be your escort." But you told me so particularly that Miss Marsden's visit was disagreeable to you, so I tried to keep her out of your way as much as possible. And she, dear girl, when I told her the truth, as I was naturally obliged to do, for fear of appearing rude, said, so nicely, "Oh I quite understand; Mr. Gardner is so kind, and we women, with our long tongues, show so particularly in his way.
Dispose of me as you will; only in my heart I am allowed to disturb Mr. Gardner, if I am allowed immediately. Wasn't that sweet of her, Willie?"
"I don't see that it was necessary to repeat my nonsense," said William; "it was but a joke after all."
"You are trying to represent himself as insensible, shaking her head," said Bessie, shaking her head. "You were quite in earnest at the time."
"Then I must have been a great brat, said William.
"Don't fish for compliments," said Bessie, laughing and rising from the table.
Then William got up too, and strolled into the garden. He felt hurt and annoyed at Bessie's indifference. What a Gott Miss Marsden, must think him! Not that he signified what Miss Marsden thought, only—here William could find no satisfactory explanation, and branched off into other questions. But in another minute, he had returned again to Miss Marsden, and was continuing the argument with increased angry. He tried to represent himself as insensible in the worst possible light; he blackened his own character to a degree that left reformation almost hopeless, and then he turned suddenly, and said, "What must she think of me?" when there was no doubt in the world what Miss Marsden would have thought of such an abandoned creature if Bessie had been quick enough to bring her in.
"I consider the photographs of Mr. Francis as good and as true as any I have ever seen in England, and I have seen some of the best." JAMES B. MUIR. 292 spilled violet eyes, darkening and changing as she gazed at the work? No, she was thinking, if not taking the work? No people do not think. "Then was she? Disdained, scornful, contemptuous!—that was it; and this decision nearly made William turn his back on the fair, haughty beauty, and amuse himself by watching Bessie's wings with praiseworthy assiduity.

The next day, and for days to come, Maggie was still silent in his presence; the music of her voice had ceased to echo through the open windows, making the birds emulate and envious. William had taken to his books again, but not violently. He studied hard in the morning, but was always ready at his dinner hour, and devoted his whole evenings to Bessie's wools. In the afternoon he would sometimes take a walk in the lanes, and on one of these occasions, as he was passing a lonely cottage on the borders of the common, he was astonished to hear a rich, soft, undulating voice singing the tuning of a hymn. He listened, absorbed—The low tones of the voice, the faintest faintest murmur, and whilst he gazed about the spot, hoping to hear more, the cottage door suddenly opened, and Maggie came coloured violently up to her snow-white temples.
"I never expected to see you here," she said, looking painfully embarrassed and speaking with evident constraint. "Will you start home at once—that is to say, if you are going home. It wouldn't do for me to be with you at present. I shall take a long walk—you will tell Bessie so, and when I return I shall go straight to my own room if she will let me have a cup of tea there. I hope you believe that I would not let you run the least risk for the world. That would be too cruel. Pray go away at once." William was piqued by her transparent efforts to get rid of him, and escape his companionship during the walk home, and he bowed to her with great coldness and hurried away. Did she mean the risk to his reputation? or to her reputation? It was a strange speech to make; it seemed to make a beauty who knew the speech of an insolent thought it possible she could see without conquering. He was much obliged to her for her care, but how it could signify to Bessie he was at a loss to conceive. Only that it was barely possible, on consideration, that Bessie might have asked her to spare him on account of her relation with her late husband. Such numbers of men she had her eyes, that a poor student could not avoid her triumph. For Bessie's sake she had doubtless promised that William should be kept as much as possible out of danger. It was very kind of them both to take care of him, but he was not afraid, not in the least.
And William laughed aloud, as if the mere idea were ridiculous in the extreme.
"Have you seen Maggie anywhere?" said Bessie who met him at the entrance of the garden. "I missed her at twelve o'clock, and she hasn't been home since. I hope nothing has happened."
"I met her a little while ago," was the reply, and she gave him a message for her. She was going for a long walk, and would like to have a cup of tea in her room when she comes home."
"How strange!" said Bessie, thoughtfully. "What can she mean? But where did you meet her?"
"I met her in the common. She came out of Widow Mayne's cottage." Bessie gave a little shriek of dismay—"Mary Mayne has the small pox," she said, and grew white as she spoke. "Oh Willie what shall we do?"
"She was singing to the poor girl," muttered William to himself, in a self-reproachful tone, "and I called her scornful and vain, when she was only thinking of the infection for Bessie and myself, and trying to keep us free of her risk. I shall never forgive myself."
"Nor I either," said Bessie, catching distinctly the end of his soliloquy. "I ought to have kept a guard on her. I knew how rash she was, so that I had no excuse. She will catch the small pox, and then I shall never have another happy moment."
"But Bessie," said William, speaking more hopefully than he felt, "she may not catch it after all. She does not seem to have any fear."
"She does not know what fear is, that's the worst of it," replied Bessie, mournfully.
"She will be going again, I know she will;
and she will have another happy moment." Bessie was working herself into a painful degree of excitement and self-reproach—One minute she was for running to the cottage to bid her Maggie, although William had told her repeatedly that her friend was no longer there. Then she declared that she would go and search for her on the hills.
This scheme also William resented her to abandon by representing its utter utility—With difficulty Bessie was persuaded to remain quietly at home, but she wandered restlessly in and out of the house all the evening.
"Soon after nine o'clock they heard a step on the path outside—a cautious step anxiously disguised, but Bessie knew it well. She rushed out, and, as Maggie opened the door she fell into her friend's arms.
"Oh, Maggie, my darling, my darling!" exclaimed Bessie, sobbing. "What have you been doing?"
"My duty, I hope," was the quiet reply.
But William, as he pressed forward to touch her hand, fancied that her face shone as the face of an angel. He took with eager veneration the soft fingers she frankly gave him, and his eyes brightened with tears as he began to speak.
"If you can't think of yourself you should think of others," he said. "Your life is valuable to a great many."
"No, only to this dear Bessie here," said Maggie, sorrowfully. "I didn't you know that I was an orphan?"
"But you have friends and relatives to whom you would be answerable if you ceaselessly endangered your life."
"It was not needlessly," said Maggie, with a sweet, soft smile. "The poor girl was in such suffering, and so desolate."
"She has her mother," interrupted Bessie.
"But she is out at work the greater part of the day," said Maggie. "She can afford to stay at home less than ever now, her daughter being such an expense to her. Oh, Bessie, you shouldn't have kissed me!" she suddenly added. "I wanted to keep out of your way as much as possible."
"I should go straight to my room when I returned."
"But you shan't," said Bessie, tightening her hold desperately. "If you with your youth and beauty, are not afraid, why should I be? No, Maggie, you shall have your way as far as I am concerned. You shall escape if he likes, and to-morrow we go and see Mary Mayne together."
"No, we won't," said Maggie, firmly.

"Then I will go alone," said Bessie, in a tone of great decision. "Come, Miss Maggie, you shan't have this good work all to yourself. Now, Willie, go into the dining-room, and have your tea there; you are not a weak-minded, Quixotic creature, like this poor Maggie of mine, but a young man believing in the great good, and besides you are the last of your mother's children; therefore I forbid you to run the least risk for her sake and your own. Will you obey me, sir?"
"No," said William, steadily.
"Then you are a dear old fellow," said Bessie; and she made a dash at him, caught him by the neck, and gave him an energetic kiss, Maggie laughing all the time.
Bessie was very impulsive, certainly, but he did not owe his kiss entirely to his good sentiments; he looked so like her husband at the moment, that the little widow's heart warmed towards him in a way it had never done before, and she thought as she considered that when her heart warm towards you, they like to embrace you if so that you can find any decent excuse.
(To be continued.)

RECEIPTS.
DOUGH NUTS.—Take one pint of warm milk, cut into it one-fourth of a pound of butter; four eggs well beaten; one pound and a half of brown sugar. Stir the sugar into the eggs; grate half a nutmeg, add to the kind of a lemon grated, a mix these all together well; thicken this into a good soft batter with sifted flour; beat this well, then add a wine glass half-full of good brewer's yeast. When quite light, have ready some boiling lard, and drop in the dough nuts. Fry a nice, light brown, put them in to a collander while hot to drain; then sift sugar over them.

CORN-MEAL MUFFINS.—Three cups of corn-meal, one half cut of sifted wheat flour, three eggs well beaten, two large spoonfuls of butter, and one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in one pint of buttermilk, and a little salt. Beat these well together, pour into rings, and bake a nice brown in the oven.

RYE CAKES.—Three cups of rye-meal, three of corn-meal, a little salt, one small teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a cup of milk, a teaspoonful of grated nutmeg and ground cinnamon, mixed; then add as much milk as will make a thin batter; bake on the griddle. Serve hot.

POTATO CAKES.—Boil four potatoes, skin and peel them, mash smoothly, and beat in a spoonful of good, sweet lard; then pour in one pint of new milk; stir this well; add a very little salt, and as much flour as will make it the consistency of muffins—this is to drop from the spoon; then add two large spoonfuls of yeast. Set it to rise, Bake in rings in the oven. Serve hot.

CORN CAKES.—Two pounds of sifted meal; pour on this one pint of sour milk or cream; cut up a spoonful of good butter; beat three eggs, and stir in a little salt; with one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a little milk.
This must be very lightly beaten; then pour into tins, and bake quickly.

BUTTERMILK MUFFINS.—Stir into one quart of buttermilk one teaspoonful of soda, and into one quart of flour one teaspoonful of cream of tartar; add them, and beat them well together, and pour in to the muffin rings, and bake on a griddle. Serve hot.

A REVOLTING EXHIBITION.
A Chicago paper says:—In a small waggon, drawn by two dogs, sits a man in soldier's attire, a woman and a little girl.
The woman deliberately unhooks her dress in front, and there the wonder seekers see coiled up in her bosom a rattlesnake about four feet in length. The reptile shoots out its head, darting it rapidly too and fro, and slowly uncoils itself, as the woman, taking it in their warm nest holds it up, while the man narrows low she suckles it as she would a child. The man, removing his hat from his head, passes his fingers through his hair and draws from its nest amongst its shaggy locks, a spotted toad, black and yellow which he permits to crawl around his neck and over his face.

HORSES SAVED.
The lives of thousands of horses have been saved during the past year, and the credit is due to "Darley's Arabian Heave Remedy and Condition Medicine." This preparation is being extensively used, and exacts from all the highest praise. Nothing of the kind has ever before been half as successful or given such universal satisfaction; it cannot be equalled.
We can confidently recommend it, and would advise all who own horses to keep a supply of on hand—it may be the means of saving your horses' lives.
Remember the name, and see the signature of Hard & Co., is on each pk. gage.
Northrop & Lyman, Newcastle, C. W., Proprietors for the Canadas. Sold by all Medicine Dealers.

WHAT'S THE NEWS?—What's the news is an every-day question. In Town or country, in the rail-car, during the promenade, or while chatting at the tea-table, the inquiry is, "What's the news?" Well, dear reader, the news this week comprises something which perhaps you have not yet heard. We have a New Drug Store in town and it is without an equal in the County for neatness and beauty. Besides being an extensive establishment, it is really a credit to this flourishing town and sible county—situated opposite S. O.
Bigelow's. (See Advertisement.)
