MARY KENDAL LOSES HER WAY AMONG THE MOUNTAINS. Before the break of the day Mary Kendal was far among the mountains. Through the hours of darkness she had toiled upward with steady and unflagging zeal, her great object being to travel beyond the region of general habitation while the occupants of the houses near the bases of the mountains were asleep, so that they might not see her and so be unable to give information to any one who might come in pursuit. She was congratulating herself on having gained this important object, when several hours after midnight, and just as the purple dawn was streaking the east she came to a level place in the steep path and paused to take the first rest she had allowed herself since she left her father's castle. For nearly two hours she had passed neither cabin nor cottage, and concluded that nought but solitary mountain sheilings would now be met with, the residents of which would have little or no communication with the valley. She had reached that solitary eminence without having been seen by anyone. Once or twice the flickering light from a peat. fireflashed through a cabin window and shone upon the path, and she caught a glimpse of the happy circle within; but on these occasions she passed the place with such caution that even the dog did not bark, and turning away from the gleaming light, she pressed with resolute heart against the toilsome slope. of the paths, and ner tender feet won t allow have been to he a surly, unfeeling man, eyed her to walk fast, so that she may easily be to he a surly, unfeeling man, eyed her No personal fear found a place in her bo-
