THE HAUNTED CASTLE. (Continued from last week.)

'Yes—yes—if you won't allow her to accompany me, she must remain, for I will not be robbed of another farthing.' Be it so,' said Captain Jack in a stony voice. Lady, you have heard the fate to which your husband consigns you. He, and he alone, can save you from it. Remove please; I'll try to bear them with good hube wary and circumspect, for if a suspicion be raised that you are other than you seem at least prevent you from putting them in lost.

They were led away, and were conveyed through a door in an aperture at the side of the cavern. The captain sat gazing at them through a door in an aperture at the state of the cavern. The captain sat gazing at them till they had disappeared, then he started up and prepared to leave his elevated platform, when his eye fell upon Terry and Andrew, who were being brought forward in charge of the leader of the band who had 'Hilloa, Bartlet,' he exclaimed, 'more

I suppose you know into his resolution, her fate is sealed all power whose hands you have fallen, and what you require to do to procure your liberation. Andrew scratched his head. He had his answer quite ready, but did not wish to be too prompt in his replies, lest the robber should suspect a previous plan.

'Dod,' he answered, after a minute's pause, 'I think the best way tae dae would be for her tae send the draft tae me, address-
