CHAPTER XXX.
THE EXPLANATION--A MEETING BETWEEN OLD LOVER--THE CAPTAIN'S AGENCY.
The chamber in which the wife of the miser Henderson was confined had its entrance from the extreme corner of the great hall in the cavern, and this entrance was not secured with a grating like the other, but had a thick, iron-bound door. The same jailer who attended the other prisoners, at a sign from the Captain, took a key from his belt, and, opening the door, stood aside till they should pass.
Hargreave entered first, and the Captain following behind, stood in the shadow just within the chamber, his face being half averted, and otherwise concealed by his velvet cap, from which a large tassel depended.
The lady they had just seen in her own side of the rich-embroidered chairs which helped to make up the comfort of the well-furnished apartment. Her head leans on her hand, and her expression was that of hopeless dejection. She was very youthful; her oval face was pale, but dignified, and a deep melancholy was settled upon her. It was probably she who had just entered the chamber, and who had just seen in her own
