Och, yer honour, answered Terry, 'I uldu't have the bad manners to go out fore a gintleman.'
Asplin laughed, and, turning round, walked into the passage, Terry following close behind him, yet before the factor, whose wrath blazed out at once. 'You are forgetting the manners you boast of," he said, angrily, at the same time laying his hand on the collar of Terry's coat to drag him back.

' Feint a bit ov me,' returned Terry, shaking him unceremoniously off. 'I said I with the happy peasantry. Light fleecy couldn't think ov going out afore a gintleman, but I would think shame to go behind a dirty blackguard like vou.'

Rascal, I'll make you repent this yet, hissed the enraged factor, but Terry snapped his fingers in his face, and told him 'he did'nt care a straw for his threats.'

Let me have a look at you,' said Asplin when they get to the open air and the light. · Will you do some work for me if I pay you for it."

Well, I tell you what I want. Your landlord is coming to reside at Dundarra. He will arrive this day week with his bride. and a part of his mansion must be prepared for them. As I have no doubt there will be a great deal to do, I will require a number of hands. You are the very fellow to give me your assistance.1

'Misther Ormond coming to live at Dundarra. Harrah, harrah, shouted Terry, capering about in joyous excitement. 'That's the best bit o' news Dundarra has heard for many a year. Come and help yer honour. Ov course I will, and so will every boy in the village.

'That's right. Now, I know you will are free. So I'll not take you down now, then we will see what is to be done.

sion-house and grounds of Dundarra. The an arrow, and lined on either side by old warmly praising his zeal and activity, had of dark green trellis-work. As it entered the park the avenue took a sweeping curve, and widened gracefully up to the portico of the mansion, the pillers of which were surrounded by rough planks to protect them from the cattle in the park. This seemed he looked at him, the same idea recurred the only precaution taken to preserve the that he ought to know him. mansion. In all other respects it was left to desolation and neglect: The windows were many of them broken, and all thickly covered with dust and dirt. The garden was Oh, the British Lion is a noble scion, fearfully overgrown with weeds, and the trees had grown to a wild luxuriance. The wall was broken down in several places, and cattle strayed over parterres and what had once been magnificent flower borders. The extensive park was dotted with fine trees of giant proportions-chestnuts, beeches, elms-which were wonderfully proportionate considering the neglect to which for many years they had been subjected. This was the scene of desolation and disrepair which Henry Asplin had to operate upon and make somewhat comfortable and pleasant within a week. Being a man of immense energy, promptitude, and activity, he set to work at once, resolved on what was to be done, and the best way of doing it. When first he contemplated the magnitude of the desolation, he thought it would only be possible to get one or two rooms into a state proper for the reception of Mr. Ormond and his bride, but before the first day was expired he saw reason to extend the plan of his operations. Terry Cushaleen proved of immense service in the matter. His zeal and activity knew no bounds. He was here, there, everywhere, and infused wherever he went such cheerfulness and good humour that everybody wrought with enthusiastic diligence. The news that the landlord was coming to reside at Dundarra produced such joy among the people that with one consent they resolved to abandon the fields for a week, and labour to prepare the house and grounds for the reception of Mr. Ormond and his young wife. So they came down in hundreds, and put their services at Asplin's disposal.

The latter, seeing he had enough strength for the accomplishment of almost anything, resolved on a most comprehensive plan of operations, and all who came were at once set to some kind of work. Terry acted as first lieutenant and promoted the general enthusiasm by his mirth and boisterous good nature. Jacob O'Brady was nowhere in the bustle and excitement which prevailed. At last the important day dewned. All was in readiness. By sunrise a hand of the villagers came to throw festoons of flowers over the avenue at various parts, and erect triumphal arches at the gates and between two splendid trees which grew on the edge of the lawn. By an early hour these ornamental erections were affected, flags were hoisted on the top of the mansion, and the preparations were complete. It was a bright, balmy, harvest day. All nature seemed joyous as if in sympathy clouds floated gracefully across the blue sky, and a gentle refreshing breeze was wafted over the corn-fields, filling the air with waves of perfume.

Long before the hour at which the happy pair was expected to arrive, the people, dressed in their best, poured through the gate and formed into a crowd upon the lawn, where an immense quantity of good cheer was provided, ready for distribution. Then as it drew near 12 o'clock, the hour of Faix, yer honour, I'll do it without pay- arrival, the great door of the mansion was thrown open, and the people of rank and station who had come from various parts of the district to welcome home the young owner of Dundarra, took up a position under the portico. Conspicuous among these was old Squire Kendal, in whose countenance there rested a mournful shaddow, caused by the recent elopement of his daughter. By his side stood Jacob O'Brady, inwardly restless and disturbed, yet anxious to meet his master and know how far his power at Dundarra was likely to be curtailed.

As the Squire gazed across the lawn, and saw the gay scene and the excitement and animation of the people, his heart swelled with gratification.

'Ha!' he said, addressing himself to the wish to see your father, and tell him you factor, 'this is something like the days of old when Irish Squires were loved and but meet me at the mansion in an hour, and respected by a loyal peasantry. This is a sight which makes my heart beat with joy and brings the tear into my eye. God bless hit,' answered Terry. 'Och, it's meeself young Ormond. May he prove worthy of that's like to go mad with joy; and so will this day's demonstration, and restore his house and name to its former honour and renown.

'If he be in all respects like the Colonel his father,' observed the factor, 'he will be worthy of the welcome which is this day accorded to him.

At the side of the portice, and on the lowest step, stood Michael Cushaleen and Terry, not the least gratified of those who were there assembled. Dash sat on his haunches between them, and Michael had his hand REJOICINGS AT DUNDARRA .-- AN ASTOUNDING upon the dog's shaggy head, lest he should DISCOVERY .- WELCOME AND RECONCILIATION. be tempted by the surrounding excitement

Terry was particularly delighted on this building, which was a handsome modern festive occasion, for it was greatly owing to structure, was approached by a fine avenue him that such an immense improvement nearly a mile in length, straight almost as had been effected; and Mr. Asplin, while besch trees, whose wide spread branches assured him that he would not fail to inform met above and formed a long leafy archway Mr. Ormond of the immense and important services he had rendered.

Terry and Mr. Asplin had wrought together in uncommon harmony. The former was full of admiration at the quick decisive habits of Asplin, his clear perception and energetic procedure, and ever and anon, as (To be Continued.)
