AT THE BRIDAL. Wide stood the doors, that morning Of the sombre and ancient church, and gaily the yellow sunshine Streamed in on its seldom search—Streamed over the rusting satins, Over jewel and waving plume, Over smilin; and confident gallan's, Over women all beauty and bloom. And I paused to look at the pageant In the midst of the shimmer and stir, and to here the priest murmu: "Forsaki All others, cleave only to her."

Pair twinkled the taper-set altar, And sweet blew the organ's breath While the lover bent and repeated, "To love and to cherish till death." The light from the great roce window Came splendially sifting down; On her face there fell a glory, And over her har a crown.

And I knew by the awful passion With which he stood white and wan That he cast his heart before her For her feet to tread upon. And I saw the bride was softly smili-Lovesome and bright and fair; He was but the ring on her finger, He was but the rose in her hair. And I would there had been a glamous Over my eyes, and a blur.

Over my eyes, and a blur.
At that eager yow of forsaking
All others, and cleaving to her;
For out of the pillared shadow
I saw beside me start.
A wild-eyed girl, with her boby
Clasped over her breaking heart.
And down from the porch 20 flying.
The wreck of a rapture unblessed—
with only the river fer rest!

DR. SANGSTER'S CASE. A COMPLETE REVIEW OF THE CIRCUM-STANCES.

Perhaps the most marvellous thing about the whole matter is the readiness with which people receive with faith the matrimonial quarrel—we might say a matrimonial tragedy—without one tittle of evidence having been adduced in support of that assertion, or one official document being brought forward in support of the representations and actions of one who had the strongest of all possible reasons for falsifying the record and justifying himself. To this day there is not one person of standing and character who can deliberately say that he has seen any evidence of Dr. Sangater's ever having been divorced even in the States. He may have been, but no evidence has ever been given of the how, the when, or the where. The present scandals about divorces in the States, as brought out in the Brinckley case, are such as to shock even those who are not very straight laced, and to raise a general cry throughout the Union for a thorough reform in the marriage and divorce laws. But in cases of the lossest kind, even on the other side, a statement of when, where, and on what grounds a divorce has been asked now under consideration. and granted, can always be officially certified, and put beyond all doubts as to its reality, whatever may be said of its validity or moral character. Yet here we have intelligent Canadian teachers and others professedly satisfied with the unsupported statement of the principal in a case of alleged divorce and remarriage, to the effect that the Naylor.

divorce in question had actually been secured somewhere over in the States, and was all right!
