They commenced their search, dispu-They commenced their search, disputing, the one hotly, the other temperately, as to which was the exact spot. With feet and hands they hunted as well as the dark would allow them; all in vain, and Ketch gave vent to a loud burst of feeling when he realized the fact, that they were positively locked up in the closters, beyond hope of succor, in the dark and lonely night.

The Wardens of the two Counties were in Bobcaygeon yesterday, to open the tenders for the higher for the higher for the new CHAPTER XII.

Fordham quitted the ball, a lamp in his hand, and traversed sundry pas-sages which brought him to the deanery garden. Crossing the garden, and treading another short passage, he came to the closters. The bishop had followed, highted by Fordham, and talking affably.

"Good night to your fordship." The servant went back to the deanery. The prelate groped his way round to the west quadrangle.

Are you closing, Ketch !" Mr. Ketch started as if he had been shot, and his voice dropped to a calm. Truth to say, his style of complaint had not been orthodox, not exactly suitable to the ears of his bishop. He and Jen-kins both recognized the voice, and bowed low, dark though it was. "What is the matter, Ketch ! You are making enough noise."

BUSH FIRES.

A telegram from Ottawa says:—
The whole surrounding country is suffering from bush fires. Last night the heavens were lit with a lurid glare, and meanwhile we are locked in for the night, and here's his right reverend lordship, the bishop, locked in with us!" danced old Ketch, nearly Abo boside himself with and anger. "Of course, it wouldn't matter for me and Jonkins: speaking in comparison, we are nobody but it is a shameful indigexclaimed the bishop, his tone betraying amusement as well as annoyance; and, with his own prelatical hands, he pum-melled at the door and shouted out with his own prelatical voice. When the bishop was tired, Jenkins and Ketch set on to pummel, and they pummelled set on to pulmed, and they pulmed their till their knuckles were sore and their throats were hoarse. It was all quite in vail. The garden intervened between them and the deanery, and they could not be heard.

It cortainly was a pretty situation, as the prelate remarked: the Right Rever-end the Bishop of Helstenleigh, ranking about lifth, counting by precedence, on the episcopal bench, locked up ignominiously in the cloisters of Helstonleigh, with Ketch the porter, and Jenkins the steward's clerk; likely, so far as appearances might be trusted, to have to pass the night there! The like had never yet been heard of.

The bishop went to the south gate, and tried the keys himself; the bishop went to the west gate, and tried them there: the bishop stamped about the juadrangle, hoping to stamp upon the missing keys; but nothing came of it. Kotch and Jonkins attended him-Ketch grumbling in the most angry torms that he dared, Jonkins in hum

"I really do not see what is to be done," debated the bishop, who, no doubt, wished himself well out of the dilemma, like any less exalted mortal would have done. "The doors leading into the college are sure to be closed."

"Quite sure," groaned Ketch.

"And to get into the college would not serve us, that I see," added the bishop. "We should be no better off there than here."

"Saving that we might ring the bell, my lord," suggested Jenkins, with def-
