THE CHANNINGS.

"I say, Hurst, don't be such a ninny as to keep them about you" exclaimed Berkely, in a fright. "Suppose Pye should go in for a search this morning, and visit our pockets! You'd floor us at once"

"The truth is, I don't know where to put them," ingenuously acknowledged Hurst. "If I hid them at home, they'd get found; if I dropped them in the street, some hullabaloo might arise from it"

"Let's carry them back to the old iron shop, and get the fellow to retake them at half the price we paid"

"Catch him doing that! Besides, the trick is sure to get wind in the town; he might be capable of coming forward and declaring that we bought the keys at his shop"

"Let's throw 'em down old Pye's well"

"They'd come up again in the bucket like ghosts do"

"Couldn't we make a railway parcel of them, and direct it to 'Mr. Smith, London'"

"Two pounds to pay, to be kept till called for," added Mark Galloway, improving upon the suggestion. "They'd put it in their fire proof safe, and it would never come out again"

"Push them into the river," said Stephen Bywater; "that's the only safe place, they'll lie at the bottom forever. We have got time to do it now. Come along"

Acting promptly upon the impulse, as schoolboys usually do, they went galloping out of the cloisters, running against the head master, who was entering then, and nearly overturning his equilibrium. He gave them an angry word of caution; they touched their caps in reply, and somewhat slackened their speed, resuming the gallop when he was beyond hearing.

Inclosing the cathedral and its precincts on the western side was a wall, built of red stone. It was only breast high, standing on this side, the cathedral side, but on the other it descended several feet, to the broad path which ran along the banks of the river. The boys made for this wall, and gained it, their faces hot and their breath gone.

"Who'll pitch 'em in?" cried Hurst, who did not altogether relish being chief actor himself, for windows looked on to that particular spot from various angles and corners of the Boundaries.

"You shall do it, Galloway"

"Oh, shall I, though?" returned young Galloway, not relishing the office.

"Oh, precious rebel! Take 'em, boys, and do as I order you"

Young Galloway was under Hurst. He no more dared to disobey him than he could have disobeyed the head master. Had Hurst ordered him to jump into the river he must have done it. He took the keys tendered him by Hurst and was raising them for the pitch, when Bywater laid his hand upon them and struck them down with a sudden movement, clutching them to him.

"You little wretch, you are as deaf as a donkey" he uttered. "There's somebody coming up. Turn your head, and look who it is"

It proved to be Fordham, the dean's servant. He was but accidentally passing. The boys did not fear him, nevertheless, it was only prudent to remain still, and he had gone. They stood, all the five leaning upon the wall, soiling their waistcoats and the sleeves of their jackets, in apparent contemplation of the view beyond. A pleasant view. The river wound peacefully along between its green banks, meadows and cornfields were stretched out beyond, while an opening afforded a glimpse of that lovely chain of hills, their tops touching the blue sky, and the white houses nestled at their base. A barge drawn by a horse, was appearing slowly from underneath the city bridge, blue smoke ascending from its chimney. A woman on board was hanging out linen to dry. A sloop, a coal of stockings, and a handkerchief for bodiend a change for the coming Sunday. A young girl was cooking potatoes beside her; and a man, probably the husband, sat sheering, his nose in his mouth. The boys loved the river, on the boat.

"I should mind such a life as that fellow's yonder" exclaimed young Berkeley, who was fonder of idleness than no was of Latin. "I'll turn bargeman of other trades first. It must be rather jolly to sit steering a boat all day and be nothing but smoke"

"Fordham's gone, and he banged to him. Now for it, Galloway"

"Stop a bit, said Bywater. "They must be wrapped up, or else tied close together. Better wrap them up, and then no matter who sees. They can't swear there are keys inside. Who has got any paper?"

One of the boys, Hall, had his exercise book with him. They tore a sheet or two out of it, and folded it round the keys, Hurst producing some string. "I'll be thrower," said Bywater.

"Make haste, then, or we shall have to wait till the barge has gone by"

Bywater took a cautious look round, saw nobody, and flung the parcel into the middle of the river. "Rara avis in terris nigroque simillima cygno" ejaculated he.

"Now, you gents, what be you a throwing into the river?"

The words came from Hudson, the porter to the Boundaries, who appeared to have sprung up from the ground. In reality he had been standing on the steps leading to the river, but the boat house had hid him from their view. He was a very different man from the cloister porter, was afraid of the college boys rather than otherwise and addressed them individually as "sir." The keeper of the boat house heard this and came up the steps.

"If your gentlemen have been a throwing anything into the river, you know that it's against the rules"

"Don't bother" returned Hurst to the keeper.

"But you know it is wrong, gentlemen," remonstrated the keeper. "What was it you threwed in? It made a dreadful splash"

"Ah, what was it?" coolly answered Hurst. "What should you say to a dead cat? Hudson, have the goodness to mind your business, unless you would like to get reported for interfering with what does not concern you"

There's a quarter to ten" exclaimed Bywater, as the college clock chimed the three quarters. "We shall be marked late, every soul of us"

They flew away, their feet scarcely touching the ground, clattered up the school room stairs and took their places. Time was only beginning to call over the roll, and they escaped the "late" mark.

It's better to be born lucky than rich," says saucy Bywater

CHAPTER XVI.

SOUGHT TO ALTER.

At the same moment Constance Channing was traversing the Boundaries, on her way to the house of Lady Augusta Yorke where she had, some days since, commenced her duties. It took her scarcely two minutes to get there, for the houses were nearly within view of each other. Constance would willingly have commenced the daily routine at an earlier hour. Lady Augusta freely confessed that to be no earlier would be useless, for she could not get her daughters up. Strictly speaking, Lady Augusta did not try personally to get them up, for she generally lay in bed herself. "That is one of the habits I must alter in the children," thought Constance.

She entered, took off her things in the room appropriated, and passed into the school room. It was empty, though the children ought to have been there preparing their lessons' Fanny came running in, her hair a mass of curl papers, and her mouth full of bread-and-butter.

"Curry has not finished her breakfast, Miss Channing," quoth she. "She was lazy this morning"

"I think somebody else was lazy also," said Constance, gently drawing the child to her. "Why did you come down half dressed my dear?"

"I am whole dressed," responded Fanny. "My frock's on, and my pinafore"

"And these" said Constance, touching the curl papers.

ONWARD.

YOUNG BRITONS.

Correspondence of The Post.

A lodge of Orange Young Britons was formed here last Friday, by the brethren from Lindsay, assisted by the County Master, Bro. Thomas Stevenson. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:—W. Master, Bro. D. Williamson; W. D Master, W J. Redmans; Sec. Wm. Beatty, jr.; Treasurer, James O'Dell; Chaplain, George Anderson; master of the ceremonies, Abraham Laidley; Committee, David Kerr, Wm. Cunningham, D. Bannen, Henry W. Sherwood and Jos. Fee. After the business of the lodge was concluded, the brethren of Onward entertained the brethren from Lindsay at an excellent supper at the Benton House. Speeches were delivered by several prominent Orangemen of the district, who favoured the company with their presence, amongst whom were Bro. Thos Stevenson, County Master; Bro. J. Shaw, District Secretary; Bro. Thos. Heel, Master of L.O. L. No. 648; Bro. H. W. Howard, from Toronto, and others. All present enjoyed a pleasant evening, and after singing the National Anthem, dispersed for their homes.

MUD LAKE GARDEN.

W. M. PIC-NIC—BAD ROADS—CROPS—FIRES

Correspondence of The Post

We had a very pleasant pic-nic here on the 10th of the month. It was for the benefit of the children of the W. M. Sunday School. Considering the busy time with farmers there was quite a gathering. We had the pleasure of having the Oakwood choir in attendance, and they greatly contributed to the enjoyment of the day. Much credit is due to Mr. Foster, the school teacher, for his efforts to procure the services of the choir, and we would thank, through the columns of THE POST, our friends from Oakwood for coming 36 miles to assist in our annual pic-nic. A large number of the scholars gave good recitations and dialogues, and we must also say we had a choir composed of the children. The Rev. Mr. Henderson, who was the only minister present, made a few remarks and then brought the proceedings to a close. Receipts after all expenses were paid, $20

The road between here and Balsover is very bad, but it is the intention to expend a considerable sum of money on it and then we hope but it will be passable.

Crops are all harvested. Fall wheat is not very good, but the spring crops were never better.

There is to be another pic-nic on the opposite side of the lake in a short time. A great time is expected.

The woods are on fire around us, and unless we get rain soon there will be considerable damage done. The weather is very hot.

[The above was crowded out last week.]
