Where one has yielded to temptation, fingering what was not his own, hundreds rise superior to it, retaining their integrity always. I would advise you not to be so free with your tengue.

Not to be free with his tengue would have been hard to Roland. "Lady Augusta was sending a box of samonile pills to some friend in Ireland, the other day, sir, but it was never heard of again, after she put it into the post-office here;" cried he to Mr. Galloway. "The fellow who appropriated it so doubt thought he find got a prize of jowels. I should like to have seen his mortification when he opened the pareel and found it contained pills! Lady Augusta said she hoped he had the liver complaint, and then they might be of service to him."

Mr. Galloway made no response. He Mr. Galloway made no response. He

Mr. Galloway made no response. He had caught up a lease that was lying on Jenkins's desk, and stood locking at it with no pleasant expression of countenance. On went that undaunted Roland:

"Safer than you would, if it depended upon your pursuing your business steadily," retorted Mr. Galloway to Roland.
"Fill in that tithe paper."

As Roland, with a suppressed yawn, and in his unisual lasy manner, sat himself to the work indicated, there came a clatter at the office-door, and a man in the uniform of a telegraphic official entered, bearing a despatch in his hand. Mr. Galloway had then turned to his own room, and Roland, ever ready for anything but work, started up and received the packet from the man.

THE LORE.

WHEN money is lost out of an office. with money is lost out of an office, suspicion very frequently falls upon one or more of that office's employes. Mr. Galloway's doubts, however, had not yet extended to those employed in his. The letter containing the bank-note had been despatched to Mr. Robert Galloway, at Yentnor, on Friday. On the Sunday morning, while Mr. Calloway was at breakfast, a short answer was dethe county, and a collection had to be raised to him from his cousin: "Your raised by his friends in order to clear tter has reached me, but not the note; you must have omitted to put it in,"
you must have omitted to put it in,"
was the news it contained, relative to that particular point. Mr. Galloway knew that he had put the note in; there was little doubt that both his clerks could testify that he had put it is, for he did it in their presence. How could thave been taken out! Had it been abstracted while the letter was still in structed while the letter was still in a office!...or in its conveyance to the st! or in its conveyance to the st! or in its transmission to Ventari ''I' in the office,'' argued Mr. Rykers opposed the bill in the most determined manner. He then suddents the last have been tampered with, probablate have been tampered with pro and ask the question." He rose from his breakfast and penned a line: South-suspton, where, as he had reason to believe, Mr. Robert Galloway would be on Monday. It was not Mr. Galloway's habit to write letters on a Sunday, but he deemed that the present occasion justified the deed. "I did put the note in the letter," he wrote. "Send me word instantly whether the seal has been tampered with. I stamped it with my private seal." Mr. Robert Galloway received this on the Monday morning. He did not wait for the post but forwarded the reply by telegraph.—"The seal had not been broken. Will send you hack the envelope by first post."

This was the despatch which you saw Mr. Galloway receive in his office.

THE RAILROAD-PROTRACTED MEETINGS

The Victoria Railway passes within less than a quarter-of-a-mile of our village, and they have been showing the work along very fast indeed, although matters have been going on in about the old style with us. There is a long distance of the road all graded, and work is going on at Cook's cut quite fast; and if they shove along as quickly for the time to come it will not be long till we shall have the pleasure of seeing the care go by even if we cannot have a
