as stance that the ships of war have been sent to San Francisco from the Amoor to protect Russian interests or to avoid the overwhelming strength of the Turkish fleet in the Mediterranean and Black Sea. Our own force on this Pacific stationwas notoriously weak until the arrival of the Shah: and if Russia has all along counted upon England's hostility sooner or later to her settled plan of attack in Europe and Asia, it is at least a convenient coincidence for her that probably in no other part of the world could so much damage be done to British commerce in a short time by a few smart vessels as in the Pacific Ocean. But then there have been a good many convenient coincidences with respect to Russian policy of late.
