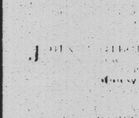
DENTISTS



DENTISTS

THE PEOPLE'S DENTAL INSTRUCTOR. A Book showing how the Teeth may be preserved to old age. Also, the Scientific Regulation of the Teeth. Natural and Artificial, written by J. Neelands, L. D. S., and to my address for 15 cents. Given to purchasers of Artificial Teeth. The best success that has attended the administration of Nitrous Oxide Gas, by the above Associates for the past fifteen years, is sufficient evidence that the public of this and adjoining counties have been given to those only of persons and on occasions that have been tested and had received the sanction of Professional Men. Ladies will receive special study at the hands of Dr. Cooney, of New York, the originator of this method for extracting teeth. This is positively the only place in Canada where Neelands, Bro. can be had on account of failure.

Artificial teeth mounted on rubber, beautiful and perfection. After having experimented for several years with the various modes of retaining artificial teeth, they have at last succeeded in perfecting an Atmospheric Suction Plate, which is successfully in every case. Patients from a distance will please call early in the day and secure an appointment. Office next to S. & O. Bigelow's, dour. Don't forget the place. Neelands & Bro., Nos. 3 and 5 Shuter-street, Toronto.

Insures against Loss or Damage by FIRE & LIGHTNING.

The OTTAWA AGRICULTURAL INSURANCE COMPANY is a purely Canadian Company, which insures nothing more hazardous than Farm Properties and Private Residences.

It insures the contents of houses, such as furniture, wearing apparel, &c.

It insures all products of the farm, agricultural implements, carriages, harness, &c.

It insures animals, even when killed by lightning on the property of the assured.

It insures churches, parsonages, colleges, convents, school houses, and all risks of this class.

It does not insure factories, shops, hotels, or any other risk of this kind, thereby avoiding the serious losses to which many companies are subject.

Farmers and owners of private residences will find it to their advantage to insure in the "Ottawa," as their terms are more liberal than those of any other Company doing a similar class of business in the Dominion.

Insure in the Ottawa, thereby saving money and at the same time encouraging Canadian enterprise.

The insuring public will please notice that our DEPOSIT is not in Debentures or Stock, generally of doubtful value, but CASH, securing absolute safety with low rates.

We would caution farmers and others not to be deceived by persons asking them to be insured in a "Provincial," but to be sure it is in the OTTAWA AGRICULTURAL, now the most popular and best Farmers' Company in Canada. Insure is no other.

H. A. WALLIS, General Agent.

FARMS FOR SALE.

The North Half of Lot No. 23, in the 3rd Con., and the West Half of Lot 23, in the 4th Con. of Eldon, 200 Acres. There are about 130 acres of excellent farming land, consisting of part clay and part sandy loam. About 10 acres of which are cleared and under cultivation, remainder hardwood bush. A comfortable frame house. The creek thereon. About 60 acres of the land consists of a beaver meadow, capable of raising from 50 to 60 tons of hay per annum, and considered the best beaver meadow in the county. The remaining portion of the land is swamp, but by cleaning out a creek that runs through the lots, and proper drainage, both the swamp and beaver meadow are capable of being converted into excellent meadow land. The farm offers unusual advantages to a party desirous of raising stock. Never failing creek and spring on lots. Two miles from Eldon Station, on T. & N. R. R., and 3 miles from Woodville.

Also the

East Half of said Lot 23, in the 4th Con. of Eldon,

Nearly all dry land and easily cleared, and within one mile of Eldon Station.

Also,

Lot No. 4, in the 9th Con. of Laxton,

200 Acres, good land, in good settlement, and within 3 miles of Norland and 5 from Coboconk.

Also about

4,000 Acres of land in the Townships of Somerville, Laxton and Bexley.

Lists and particulars of which can be obtained by application to the undersigned.

TERMS:—One-third down, and balance in five yearly instalments with interest.

A BUTTERCUP.

A little yellow buttercup
Stood laughing in the sun;
The grass all green around it,
The summer just begun;
Its saucy little head aburn
With happiness and fun.

Near by—grown, and gone to seed,
A dandelion grew,
To right and left with every breeze
His snowy tresses flew.
He shook his hoary head, and said:
"I've some advice for you.

"Don't think, because you're yellow now,
That golden days will last;
I was as gay as you are, once,
But now my youth is past.
This day will be my last to bloom;
The hours are going fast.

"Perhaps your fun may last a week,
But then you'll have to die."
The dandelion ceased to speak,
A breeze that capered by
Snatched all the white hairs from his head,
And wafted them on high.

His yellow neighbor first looked sad,
Then, cheering up, he said:
"If one's to live in fear of death,
One might as well be dead."
The little buttercup laughed on,
And waved his golden head.

THE NOBLEMAN OF THE STEPPE.

A Russian Story.

BY IVAN TOURGUENEFF.

"Of middle age."

"And how did he look? He was probably an arrant scoundrel."

"Very likely."

"Why, then did he tell you, this scoundrel? had he owned the horse long?"

"I believe he said so."

"Well, nobody but he is the thief. Judge for yourself. Listen, come and stand here before me. What is your name?"

The Jew raised his black eyes to Pantaeli with an astonished air.

"What is my name?"

"Certainly. What do your people call you?"

"Moshel Leiba."

"Now, judge yourself, Leiba, my friend you are a shrewd man. By whom would Makel-Adel suffer himself to be led away except by his former master? He has even saddled and bridled him, taken off his blanket, there it lies in the hay. Every one except his former master, Makel-Adel would have trampled to pieces with his feet! He would have made such a noise that the whole village would have run together. Do you agree with me?"

"Certainly, I agree with you."

"Therefore, first of all this Cossack must be found."

"But how shall we find him, your grace! I have only seen him a single time, and where may he not be now? And what is his name? Ah, alas!" added the Jew, mournfully adjusting the locks of his hair.

"Leiba!" cried Tchertapkanoff suddenly, "Leiba, look at me! My mind is gone. I am quite beside myself. I shall kill myself if you don't help me."

"But how can I do that?"

"Come along with me—we shall go in search of the thief together."

"Where shall we go?"

"To the annual fairs—over highways and by-ways, to the horse-fairs, to cities and villages and country seats—in fact everywhere. As regards money, you may be at your ease; an inheritance has come to me, brother. I will spend my last farthing, but I will find my friend again, and the knavish Cossack he shall not escape us. Wherever he may go there we shall go to; if he hides himself under the earth, then we shall go under the earth after him. If he goes to the devil, then we shall go to Satan himself."

"No, no! not to Satan

"Leiba! You are indeed nothing but a Hebrew, and your religion is a heathenish one; but you are still better than many a Christian soul. Have pity on me! To travel alone is useless; alone I cannot carry out my undertaking. I am a hot-headed fellow, but your head is a head of gold! Your race is all made that way; you comprehend everything, without needing to learn it. You are perhaps in doubt, and wonder, which he is to get the money? Come into my room, and I will show you all my money. Take the gold, take the cross which I bear around my neck; but give me—oh, give me back Makel-Adel!"

Tchertapkanoff stood trembling as with fever, the perspiration flowed down his face, mingled with his tears, and gathered in drops in his mustache. He pressed Leiba's hand; he entreated him; he came near kissing him; he was completely beside himself. The Jew was about to answer; explained that it was impossible to be absent; that his business it was all of no avail. Pantalei would not listen to it. What choice had poor Leiba, then, but to consent?

The following day Tchertapkanoff started from Bessonovo in a peasant wagon, accompanied by Leiba. The Jew looked very disheartened, and clung with one hand anxiously to the driver's box, and his whole figure bespoke misery. Every one except his former master, Makel-Adel would have trampled to pieces with his feet! He would have made such a noise that the whole village would have run together. Do you agree with me?" was still full of bitterness. At times, however, when he made his horse fly at full speed over a newly-ploughed field or leap down to the bottom of a washed-out ravine and then climb up the steep slope, his rapture would almost stop the beating of his heart and loud shouts of triumph would burst from his throat; for then he knew—knew beyond a doubt—he had the real Makel-Adel under him and no more the pretender; for what horse in creation could perform such feats except Makel-Adel?

Still he had his share of distress and misery. The Jew-carman's quest for his horse had cost him a great deal of money. There could be no thoughts now of dogs of the Kostroma breed, and so he had to ride about in the vicinity alone as before. And never, soon to be convinced that the deacon had spoken the truth, for a few days later Pantalei Jeremeitsch appeared in his own person in the yard, riding Makel-Adel.

Perfishka ran up to his master, seized the stirrup, and offered to help him dismount; but the latter leaped down unaided, cast a triumphant glance around him, and cried loudly:

"I told you I would find Makel-Adel, and I have found him in spite of fate or my enemies."

Perfishka approached him and made a motion to kiss his hand; but Tchertapkanoff pain no heed to his servant's devotion. Leading his horse by the bridle, he went with long strides towards the stable. Perfishka looked fixedly at him and was frightened. How he had aged, and how care-worn he had grown in the course of these twelve months! And how grave and gloomy his face had grown! And still you would have thought Jeremeitsch must be delighted to have at last reached his goal. How delighted he was; but still Perfishka was frightened—yes, he felt something like awe. The servant led the horse into his former stall, patted him lightly on the side, and said, "There you are at last, come once more. Now, this time, be on your guard."

The same afternoon he hired a watchman from among the inferior peasantry, moved into his chambers, and continued his former life. And still he did not live quite as before—but of this anon.

The day following his return, Jeremeitsch, for want of a better companion, called Perfishka in, and, without surrendering an inch of his dignity, began to tell him how he had succeeded in finding his horse. During this story he sat with his face turned to the window, smoking his long-stemmed pipe, and Perfishka sat on the threshold, with his hands behind him and his eyes reverentially fixed on the back of his master's neck, listening all the while to the story of how, after many battle journeys and efforts, he had come to the annual fair at Romna. He was at that time alone, for the Jew, thanks to the weakness of his character, had not stood by him, but had run away. On the fifth day, just as he had made up his mind to depart again, he sauntered for the last time among the rows of wagons, when all of a sudden among three other horses hitched to a post, he beheld Makel-Adel. He had immediately recognized him, and the horse, too, had known his master; he neighed, tried to tear himself loose, and had pawed the ground with his hoofs.

"And it was not a Cossack that had him," Tchertapkanoff continued, still in the deepest bass voice, and without turning his head; "but it was a gypsy a horse-dealer. I, of course, claimed the horse as mine, and wanted to take him by force; but that beast of a gypsy screamed as if I had been murdering him, swore that he had bought it from another gypsy, and offered to bring witnesses. Then I spat at him and paid him his price. May the devil take him! What I chiefly cared for was to get my friend back again, that my soul might have rest. In the district of Karatchej I once, deceived by Leiba's assurances, got hold of a Cossack, whom I took to be the thief, and smashed his face. He turned out to be the son of a priest, and I had to pay him damages—one hundred and fifty rubles. Well, money can be gained in many ways; the thing of importance in my heart is with patience more. But to you, Perfishka, I give these orders: if you should—which God forbid! see a Cossack here in this vicinity, then run without delay, without saying a word, and bring me my gun. I shall then know what to do."

Thus spoke Jeremeitsch; but in his heart he was not so calm as he seemed to be.

Alas! in the depths of his soul he was not quite convinced the horse he had brought back was was really his Makel-Adel.

CHAPTER V.

And now came a time of trouble to Jeremeitsch. Rest he could endure least of all. To be sure, he had now and then some days of contentment, when the doubts arising within him seemed senseless. He would then drive away the foolish thought as he would a troublesome fly, laughing at his own folly. Then evil hours would come, when the importunate thought would begin secretly to gnaw his soul, like a mouse under the floor, and he would suffer the most unendurable tortures imagineable.

On the memorable day when Tchertapkanoff found his horse, he had been conscious of the most blissful sensations; but the very next morning when he was saddling his friend under the low shed of the inn in which he had spent the night, he felt for the first time a pang shooting through his heart. He shook his head; but the seed of suspicion had fallen deep into his soul.

During his homeward journey, which lasted about a week, his doubts seldom asserted themselves; but after his return to Bessonovo, the spot where his former indubitable Makel-Adel had lived, they grew stronger and stronger. On the journey he rode mostly in peace, rocking himself in the saddle, gazing about him, smoking his short pipe, and not indulging in reflection. At most he thought, "What a Tchertapkanoff undertakes to do he carries through;" and then he would chuckle quietly to himself.

After his arrival home the look of things changed; but of course he kept that to himself, for his pride not allow him to manifest his uneasiness. He would have torn any to pieces who had dared even remotely to intimate that the new horse was not the right one. He accepted congratulations on his "happy discovery" from the few persons whom he met, but he did not invite these congratulations, and he avoided meeting people as much as he could. He observed Makel-Adel almost uninterruptedly. He would ride out with him to a distant field and put him to the test; or he would secretly steal into the stable, close the door behind him, plant himself before the horses head, gaze into his eyes, and ask
