"So he was, but he has come back, looking uncommon well too, as brown as a berry. To my thinking, as good a fellow to look at as there is in England, and a capital fellow all round into the bargain."

"Dear me!" says Cocil. "What a loss Egypt has sustained! And what a partisan you have become! May I sak," suppressing a pretended yawn behind her perfumed han, "where he is at present hiding?"

"I asked him," says Mr. Potts, "but for some reason he evaded the question." around him are inwardly rejoicing in his lefeat.

This is a thunderbolt, though he is too much disheartened by his first defeat to notice it. Lady Stafford grows a shade or two paler, and—luncheon being at an end—rises hurriedly.

"I have seen many different shades of red in people's hair," says Molly, "but I have never seen it rosy until now. Is it dyed! It is the most curious thing I ever looked at."

As indeed it was. When introduced to poor Potts, when covering him with a first dispassionate glance, one with a first dispassionate glance, one thinks not of his pale gray orbs, his large, good-humoured mouth, his freckles, or his enormous nose, but only of his hair. Molly is struck by

Then Luttrell, who has a charming voice, sings for them something pathetic and reproachful, you may be sure, as it is meant for Molly's ears; and then the evening is at an end, and they all go to their own rooms.

To-night there are two sad hearts at Herst; Marcia's, perhaps, the saddest, for it is full of that most maddening, most intolerable of all pains, bitter isology.

For hours she sits by her casement, pondering on the cruelty of her fate, while the unsympathetic moon poursits white rays upon her.

"Already his love is dead," she murmurs, leaning naked arms upon the window-sill, and turning her lustrous eyes up to the skies above her. "Already. In two short months. And how have I fallen short! How have I lost him! By over-loving, perhapa. While she, who does not value it, has gained my all."
