"Teddy," she says, softly.

No answer.

"Dear Teddy," more softly still.

No answer.

"Dearest Teddy."

Still no answer.

Teddy—darling!" murmurs Molly, in the faintest, fondest tone, using towards him for the first time this tenderest of all love-words.

In another moment his arms are around her, her head is on his breast. He is vanquished—routed with slaughter. In the heart of this weak-minded, infatuated young man there lingers not the slightest thought of bitterness towards this girl who has caused him so many hours of torment, and whose cool, soft cheek now rests contentedly against his.

"My love—my own—do you care for me a little?" he asks, in tones that tremble with gladness and seated to treak against has tremble with gladness and seated to treak against has tremble with gladness and seated to treak against has tremble with gladness and seated to the stairs, and had seated to treak against has the pair had changed
