It appears he got a fortnight's leave and came post-haute to London to find you. Such a lover a he make? And where should he go by the merest chance, the very first evening, but into your actual presence? It is a romance," says her ladyship, much delighted; "positively it is a shame to let it sink into oblivion. Some one should recommend it to the Laureste as a theme for his next production."
| "Well?" says Molly, who at this would not forgive you?" exclaims Luttrell, gratefully. ("Least night; and avain this morn." "Well?" says Molly, who at this you !" exclaims Luttrell, gratefully.

"Well, now, of course he wants to know when he may see you."

"You didn't give him my address?"

With an amount of disappointment in her tone impossible to suppress.

"I aways notice," says Cecil, in despair, "that whenever which is seldom) I do the right thing it turns out to be the wrong thing. You swore me in to keep your secret four months ago and I have done so religiously. Today, solely against my will, I honestly confess, I still remained faithful to my promise, and see the result. You could almost beat me—don't deny it, Molly; I see it in your eyes. If we were both South Sea Islanders I should be black and blue this minute: it is the fear of scandal alone restrains you."
