Within the house everything is subdued and hushed, as must be when the master lies low. The servants walk on tiptoe; the common smile is checked; conversation dwindles into compressed whispers, as though they fear by ordinary notes to bring to life again the unloved departed. All is gloom and insincere melancholy.

Cecil and Molly, travelling down together, find Mrs. Darley, minus her husband, has arrived before them. She is as delicately afflicted, as properly distressed, as might be expected; indeed, so faithfully, and with such perfect belief in her own powers, does

"I don't exactly mean it was my personal appearance was the attraction," he returns, feeling a strong inclination to explode with laughter, as is his habit on all occasions, but quickly suppressing the desire as being wicked under the circumstances. The horror of death has not yet vanished from among them. "It was my family they were after—birth, you know—and that. Fact is, she wasn't up to the mark—wasn't good enough. Not but what she was a nice-looking girl, and had a lovely brogue. She had money too—and she had a—father! Such a father! I think I could have stood the brogue, but I could not stand the father."

stand the father."

"But why was he a lunatic? Or perhaps a Home-ruler!"

"No"—simply—"he was a tailor. When first I met Miss O'Rourke she told me her father held some appointment in the Castle. So he had. In oil his youthful days he had been appointed tailor to his Excellency. It wasn't a bad appointment, I dare say; but I confess I didn't see it."

"It was a lucky escape. It would take a good deal of money to make me forget the broadcloth. Are you coming down-stairs now? I dare say we ought to be assembling." Refore Taking low as a seafter Taking.

"It is rather too early, I am afraid. I wish it was all done with, and I a hundred miles away from the place. The whole affair has made me downright melancholy. I hate funerals. They don't agree with me."

"Nor yet weidings, as it seems. Well, I shall be as glad as you to quit Herst, once we have installed Miss Amherst as its mistress."

"Why not Shadwell as its master?"

"If I were a horrible betting-man." PORONTO & NIPISSING RAIL-

Well, I anall be as glad as you to quit Herst, once we have installed Miss Amherst as its mistress.

"Why not Shadwell as its master?"
"If I were a horrible betting-man, says Cecil, "I ahould put all my money upon Marcis. I do not think Mr. Amherst cared for Philip. However, we shall see. And"—in a yet lower tone—"I hope he has not altogether forgotten Molly."

"I hope not, indeed. But he was a strange old man. To forget Miss Massarcene—" Here he breaths a profound sigh.

"Don't sigh, Plantagenet; think of Miss O'Rourke," says Cecil, unkindly, leaving him.

One by one, and without care.

Miss O'Rourke," says Cecil, unkindly, leaving him.

One by one, and without so much as an ordinary "How d'ye do!" they have all slipped into the dining-room. The men have assumed a morone air, which they fondly believe to be indicative of melancholy; the women, being by nature more hyposritical, present a more natural and suitable appearance. All are seated in sembre garments and dead silence.

dead silence.

Marcia, in crape and silk of elaborate design, is looking calmbut full of decorous grief. Philip — who has grown almost emaciated during these past mouths—is the only one who wears successfully an impression of the most stolid indifference. He is leaning against one of the windows, gazing out upon the rich lands and wooded fields which so soon will be either all his or nothing to him. After the first swift glance of recognition he has taken no notice of Molly, nor she of him. A shuddering aversion fills her towards him, a distante bordering on horror. His very pallor, the ill-disquised missry of his whole appearance—which he seeks but vainly to conceal under a cool and smeering exterior—only adds to her dislike.
