amother, —where over the dark pine forests the glittering snow-peaks pierced the sky and the rivers of ice shone gloriously.

Kate came to tell them that Jenny was asleep, and they went up softly.

Lawrence wrote out his directions for the night and came down, Stella accompanying him. At the door he paused for a moment abstractedly.

"Don't you think it's a great loss for a person to miss the pleasure and appreciation of a noble art!" he asked, seriously.

She threw herself into the chair beside her without moving her feet, and set with her liands together in her lap, and her face bent out of his sight. He turned back, shaken and helpiese. Her attitude affected him more than any words. Presently he came round and took her head between his trembushing hands.

"Don't fret about me, Stel," he said; "I'm not worth it."

She sat up straight.

"Eugene, you must go away, directly."

He turned away his head.

"I can't," he said.

She stood up.

"Come here a moment."

Lawrence she had nothing to say. She knew that he knew that she had and very reserve power of succour came to no open rupture; what was there to say? His prevailing mood toward her was compassion for a lost soul. But many times that mood broke down by its own weight. Her light, child-like laugh, her high, clear voice talking so glibly and cherrily to people whom, as like as not, he knew she despised, came to him with a hollow, heartless ring that was maddening. He could not study; he could rush away from the sound that he was frightened to perceive was becoming hateful. Should he not go to Stella the Her hand to be should never have married Cora but for the stimulus to his compassion that the got from Stella. He did not know what he should do now but for her stimulus to his forbearance, his tending frankness when he found her alone. And she took his confidence with concern and respect, kept him steadfast, and by her refined and restrained sympathy made to him part of what he lost at home. But the childreng hard by well after many weeks and Stella went away. When she was gone he missed her very much.

Some time afterward Lawrence had a letter from a friend: "I have an alter from a friend: "I have an appening here for a young surgeon of parts and character. It will be the making of some one. a letter from a friend: "I have an opening here for a young surgeon of parts and character. It will be the making of some one. Can you send me the name of some young fellow you can recommend?"

Now, Lawrence happened to know that Stella had a cotsin, a young surgeon; in fact, she had asked him about his chance of success in that part of the country. He row invited young winlock to come down and make him a visit with a view to recommending him. He was a handsome, lively young fellow, and Lawrence liked him from the first. He and Cora got on well together, and Lawrence found the house pleasanter than he had for a long time. Stella came back to Elmtree two or three weeks later. Kate had felt the long strain after it was over, and had stumbled and broken down. When Winlock came to see his cousin, the morning after her arrival, she was struck with the change in him. He was a frank fellow, and he and Stella were good friends. She made him come and sit with her. She talked to him and watched him. He took out his watch and rose to go. She stood up before him.

"Eugene," she said, "where are you going now?"

The tall fellow looked down at her and changed color.
