Knoept in Frussia and the Grand Duchy of Oldenburg, there is an absolute decline in the number of cattle in Germany. Even such countries as fielgium, which has hereofore maintained the number of its live stock from year to year, cannot now, owing to the augmentation of population, supply its own wants, and, by consequence, heavy imports are necessary. Russia and Anstro-Hungary are the only nations which can furnish their neighbours with surplus cattle, and it is proposed now to ship dead meat from Russia. Cissy's face flushed; "I can explain it afterwards at our waltz," she thought; and in the expediency of the moment she hesitated, faltered, and moved away.

Graham Burton stood near watching. He did not hear the words, but the result satisfied him. Indignation swelled in his heart against her, as he saw Cissy gliding through the dance; and he determined not to go near her till the waltz came round which she had promised him, and then let her explain her conduct or not as it pleased her.

"Then would it be a great stretch of a round—just one ture, you know— that I may tell Captain Lambert not to mind about her." "I shall be most happy," Burton answered with a chilly smile. "Miss Ricart, may I have the pleasure!"

"Too bad to force me on you like this," Alice said. with a deprecating smile, "I am sure mamma did not think of what she was doing: I am am really ashamed of her coolness. It is so kind of you to take it so meekly. Graham only answered with another quiet smile, and offering her his arm, led her into the ball-room where they were soon whirling round among the rest; Alice looking up into his face sweetly, telling him what anice waltzer he was, whispering insipid nothings, as she smiled at the success of her mother's strategy, and wondered coolly how much money he had; passionless-ly reviewing the advantages of being able to dress as one liked, and go to all the gaities one had a mind for. She did not care that she was hurting her cousin; all she thought of was that she was determined to win; and if the truth were told the difficulties in her way rather lent a zest to the undertak-ing. And in the heart so near her own a cold stern anger had sunk; he heeded not the bright face that strove to attract him; Alice's merry words were scarcely understood, he hardly realized the weight of his disappointment yet, but looking up after awhile he saw Cissy and Captain Lambert joining the waltzers, and the last spark of his faith in her died out, leaving but angry and disappointed love—for the love he could not quench—in his heart towards her.

With quiet exultation Mrs. Ricart had seen her daughter and her partner move away, and then spying Captain Lambert had approached him.

"Captain Lambert, may I ask a favour of you?" she asked.

"Certainly," was the reply.

"Miss Campbell is in the verandah with her mother, who is ill. Would you be so very kind as to bring a little champagne?"
