Within a castle haunted,
As castles were of old,
There hung a harp enchanted,
And on its rim of gold
This legend was enscrolled:
"Whatever bard would win me
Must strike and wake within m
By our sunsyms endeavour.

The first—a minstrel hoary.
Who many a rhyme had spunsang loud of war and glory.
Of oatles fought and won;
But when his song was done,
Although the bard was lauded,
And clapping hands applauded,
Yet, spite of the laudation.
The harp ceased its vibration. GRAND reverence, no sincere sorrow shall be wanting.

"Mr. Royle, vou are a dear good friend to me. God knows how lonely I should have been without you; and yet—I made you angry."

"Do not say that. What I do I do for your safety—for your ultimate happiness; so that when we say tarewell to each other on shore, I may feel that the trust which God gave me in you was honourably and faithfully discharged. I desire, if our lives are spared, that this memory may follow me when all this seene is changed and we behold it again only in our dreams. I should have told you my meaning just now, but one cannot always express one's thoughts."

"You have told me your meaning and I shall not forget it. God bless you!" she implored, in her calm, carnest voice, and went slowly down into the cuddy.

Chapter XXVI.

The second changed the measure.
And turned from fire and sword
To sing a song a song of pleasure.
The wine-cup and the board,
Till, at the wit, all roared,
And the high hall resounded!
With merriment unbounded!
The harp, loud as the laughter—
Grew hushed as that, soon after.

deck and lifted the body and placed it on the hammock, and rolled a blanket over it. A very areat change had come over the face of the corpse since death, and I do not think I should have known it as the kindly, dignified countenance, reverent with its white hair and beard, that had smiled at me from the bunk, and thanked me for what I hadalready done.

For what I had done, Alasi how mocking was this memory now? With what painful cynicism did that lonely face illustrate the power of man over the great issues of life and death!

I brought the sides of the hammock to meet over the corpse, and held them while Cornish passed the stitches. I then sent him to find me a big holystone or any pieces of iron so as to sink
