GUIDED.

Up the long, slippery slopes we toil and strain,
Amid the ice and snow,
Untrodden heights above us to attain.
Untrodden depth below;
Danger to the left and danger to the right.
All wearily we go,

Cruel and beautiful the blue crevasse
Yawns close beside the way,
The avalanches topple o'er the pass,
Their cold, white torrents stay
Only a moment ere they roar and plunge,
To rend and whelm and slay.

Each following each, we mount, as we are led,
Up the long, steep incline;
Our guide walks calm and fearless at the head
Of the long, faltering line.
And shows the narrow path where safety is
By word and look and sign.

Marking His footsteps, treading where He trod,
Close following on His track,
We cannot faint or fall or miss the road,
Though deep the snows, and black,
The precipices yawn, and rough and steep
The forward path and back.

Intent on Him, we do not mark or see
These hard things by the way.
It is enough that we are led, and He
Whose guidance we obey
Has gone before and knows how hard it is:
What he has done we may.

Above the mists we catch a faint, far chime,
And glimpses heavenly fair
Shine through and seem to beckon as we climb—
How distant, bright they are!
Dear Guide, lead on! We do not ask for rest,
Would God that we were there.

ADAM AND EVE.

OR, THE SMUGGLERS OF PENZANCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DOROTHY FOX."

Chapter XII.

A silence ensued—one of those pauses when some event of our lives seems turned into a gulf to separate us from our former surroundings.

Adam was the first to speak, and with a touch of irony he said, "You're none of you very nimble at wishing us joy, I fancy."

"And no wonder, you've a-tooked us all aback so," said old Zebedee. "I seems to me I'm forced to turn it round and round afore I can swaller it for rale right-down truth."

"Why, is it so very improbable then?" asked Adam, already repenting the abruptness of the disclosure.

"Wa-al, 'twas no later than last night that you was swearin' agen and cussin' everybody from stem to starn for even so much as mentioning it as likely. Now," he added, with as much show of displeasure as his cheery, weather-beaten old face would admit of, "I'll tell 'ee the mind I've got toward these sort o' games: if you see fit to board folks in the smoke why do it and no blame to 'ee, but hang me if I can stomach 'ee sailin' under false colors."

"There wasn't anything of false colors about us, father," said Adam, in a more conciliatory tone; "for, though I had certainly spoken of the matter to society she had invariably met with attention and had felt inwardly gratified by the knowledge that she was attracting admiration; but now, if she gave way to this prejudice of Adam's, every time an eye was turned toward her she would be filled with fear, and each time a look was cast in her direction her heart would sink with dread.

What should she do? Give him up? Even with the prospect of possible misery staring at her Eve could not say yes, and before the thought had more than shaped itself a dozen suggestions were battling down the dread alternative. She would change him, influence him, convert him—anything but give him up or give in to him. She forgot how much easier it is to conceive plans than to carry them out—to arrange speeches than to utter them. She forgot that only the evening before, when an opportunity being afforded, she had resolved upon telling Adam the whole circumstance of Reuben May and the promise made between them, while the words were yet on her lips she had drawn them back because Adam had said he knew the promise was "nothing but the promise of a letter," and Eve's courage had suddenly given way, and by her silence she had led him to conclude that nothing else had passed between them. Joan had spoken of the envious grudge which Adam had borne toward Jerrem because he had shared in his mother's heart, so that this was not the first time Adam had dropped in call to mingle with the cup of his first love.

The thought of Joan brought the fact of her unexplained disappearance to Eve's mind, and full of compunction at the bare suspicion of having wounded that generous heart Eve jumped up with the intention of seeking her and of bringing about a satisfactory explanation. She had not far to go before she came upon Joan, rubbing and scrubbing away as if the welfare of all Polperro depended upon the amputation of every speck she could throw into her work. Her face was flushed and her voice unsteady, the natural consequences of such violent exertion, and which Eve's approach seemed to but lend greater force to.

"Joan, I want to speak to you for a moment."

"Awh, my dear, I can't listen to no spakin' now," replied Joan, hastily, "and the tables lookin' as they are."

"But Joan always scrubs the tables, you know, Joan: way should you do it?"

"Tabithy's arms ain't half so young as mine—worse luck for me or for she."

Having by this time gained a little insight into Joan's peculiarities Eve argued no further, but sat herself down on a convenient seat, waiting for the time when the rasping sound of the brush would come to an end. Her patience was put to no very great tax, for after a few minutes Joan flung the brosn along the table, exclaiming, "Awh, drabbit the ole scrubbin'! I must give over. I b'lieve I've had enuf of it for this time, at all events."

"Joan, you ain't hurt with me, are you?" said Eve, trying to push her into the seat from which she had just risen.

"I wanted to be the first to tell you only that Adam spoke me he did and took all I was going to say out of my mouth. It leaves you to think me dreadfully sly."

"Awh, there wasn't much need for tellin' me," said Joan, with a sudden relax of manner. "When I didn't shut my eyes o' purpose I could tell from the first what was certain to happen."

"It was more than I could then," Eve said. "I hadn't given it a thought that Adam meant to speak to me, and when he asked I was quite taken aback and said 'No' for ever so long."

"What made 'ee change yer mind so suddent, then?" said Joan, bluntly.

Eve hesitated. "I hardly know," she said, with a little confusion. "I think it was seein' him sit cast down made me feel so dreadfully sorry."

"H'm!" said Joan. "Didn't 'ee never feel no sorrow for t'other poor chap that wanted to have 'ee—he to London, Reuben May?"

"Not enough to make me care in that way for him—I certainly never did."

"And do you care for Adam?"

"I think I do."

"Think!"

"Well, I am sure I do."

"That's better. Well, Eve, I'll say this far;" and Joan gave a sigh before the other words would come out: "I'd rather it should be you than anybody else I ever saw."

The struggle with which these words were said, their tone and the look in Joan's face seemed to reveal a state of feeling which Eve had not suspected. Throwing her arms around her she exclaimed, "Oh, Joan, why didn't he choose you? You would have been much better for him than me."

"Lord bless the maid!"—and Joan tried to laugh through her tears—"I wouldn't ha' had un if he'd ha' axed me. Why, there'd ha' been murder between us afore a month was out: us two ha' been hung for one another. No—now don't 'ee take no such stuff as that into yer head; 'cos there's no sense in it. Adam's never looked upon me nor more than a sister;" and breaking down Joan sobbed hysterically; "and when you two's married I shall feel jactly as I'd given a brother, and be gladder than e'er a one else to see how happy you makes un."

"That's if I do make him happy," said Eve, sadly.

"There's no fear but you'll do that," said Joan, resolutely, wiping the tears from her eyes; "and 'twill be your own fault if you bain't happy yourself, Eve. Adam's got his faults to put up with and his fancies same as other men have, and a masterful temper to keep under, as nobody can tell better than me; but for rale downright goodness I shouldn't know where to match his fellow—not if I was to search the place through; and, mind 'ee, after all that's something to be proud of in the man you've got to say maister to."

Eve gave a little smile: "But then he must let me be mistress, you know, Joan."

"All right! only don't you stretch it too far," said Joan, warningly, "or no good 'ull come of it; and be foreright in all you do, and spake the truth to un. I've many a time wished I could, but with this to hide o' the sin one's and that to hush up o' t'other's I know he holds me for a downright liard
