NOT PROVEN;

—OR—

The Trials of Adam Cleaveland.

'You'll find it safe, if she is not the actual doer of the deed,' said the man firmly. 'There's nae time to lose, we maun awa' to the railway station and see what toon she took her ticket for. Good-bye.'

They moved to the door, but Bowie after a whispered word with the woman, hurried out after them, and joined them with the words—

'I don't mind going as far as the station with you, as I have—well, a kind of an interest in the matter too.'

The men made no objections, and the walk was made almost in silence. Bowie indeed was so absorbed in thought that the men thought him surly and disagreeable. In reality, however, he was engaged in the difficult task of getting at some reason for Bessie's wild conduct upon hearing of the murder. Suddenly, while puzzling himself with the question, he remembered his careless words to her at the river-side the night before, to the effect that his father's death would be very convenient, and her look of horror and reproach as she said, 'I despised you before, now I loathe you.'

'I have it!' he exclaimed aloud, snapping his fingers and altogether forgetting the presence of the constables, who turned to him with looks of polite inquiry, which pulled him up and made him redder and look stupid for the rest of the way, as he had no explanation to offer—at least to them—

'—the silly goose has jumped to the conclusion that I am the murderer,' was his mental decision in regard to Bessie's wild conduct: 'she has remembered my meaningless words, and hastily decided that I am wretch enough to take my own father's life. Flattering to me that—very. Well, if that isn't like a woman—passionate, hasty and unreasoning; and above all, like Bessie. And now she'll be kissing the child, and going on like mad, and whispering to it—Your father is a paricide, and will be hanged upon the gallows tree, and all sorts of sweet things of the kind, and hide her head in mortal terror of being dragged forth to help to send me to my doom. Blast the whole business!'

The railway station was a small one which did not usually take up or set down a score of passengers in a day, and Bessie was easily remembered by the officials. She had taken ticket for Glasgow, which city she should have reached hours before, if she actually travelled so far. The idea of telegraphing to that city instantly struck the constable, and was acted upon there and then; but the answer, which they waited to receive, was that no such person had been seen, but that the police were making inquiries. More skilful men-hunters, in shape of trained city detectives, followed the same clue most persistently some days later, but with a like result. Beautiful Bessie, from the moment she entered the train at Muckleton with her child, was not heard of or seen. Her own friends in the west, when searched out and appealed to, declared that they knew nothing of her whereabouts, and an advertisement in the principal newspapers offering a reward for information brought no reply. A second advertisement purporting to come from a firm of solicitors, and declaring that 'Bessie Burton, formerly barmaid in the Royal Restaurant, would hear of something to her advantage' by replying, also met no response; but then this last was believed to emanate from the same source as the first, and to be merely a ruse of the detective police to draw her from her hiding place.

Andrew Bowie, mentally abusing this clever hider as a 'silly goose,' made for the nearest public-house—the 'Black Bull Inn' of Muckleton—and soothed himself with a glass of beer and a pipe, and then took his way back to Drumellan alone. He was out of temper with himself, with Bessie, with the police, and with the whole world, everything in which seemed arranged on lines calculated to be most aggravating to him, and prejudicial to his comfort and advancement in life. His easy-going disposition, however, recovered itself before he had got near the town, and he was even able to draw some gleams of comfort from the fact that the 'silly fool,' as he called Bessie, had taken such an insane notion into her head. 'It'll make her keep out of the way, and that's just what I want at present,' he reflected. 'Devoted to me though

THE MANHATTAN FEED,

For Horses, Cattle, Milch Cows, Sheep, Pigs and Poultry.

COWS fed on this Feed will give one-quarter more and richer milk than when fed on the old system. This has been proven by actual experiment.

FOR FEEDING PURPOSES, the MANHATTAN FEED, if used as directed, will fatten in a surprisingly short time, and a considerable saving will be effected in preparing animals for the market. The flesh of such animals is much better and firmer than when fed in the ordinary way.

I have used and am using the Manhattan feed, and can say that I find it all that it is claimed to be a first rate article of feed. It gives the animal a healthy coat and glossy appearance. I am of opinion there is no better feed used.

I have purchased a couple of bags of the Manhattan Feed for my pigs and must say that since I commenced using it the animals thrive rapidly. I believe it a splendid article of feed, and can recommend it as such.

Messrs. Dundas & Cooper, Sirs:—Having given the Manhattan feed a trial, I can recommend it as the best feed I have ever used. I fed it to my horses and pigs, and never knew the animals to improve so fast. It gives them a clean, sleek skin, and I otherwise improves their appearance.

The above engraving represents a man about to undergo the operation of teeth extracting. It is designed to illustrate the advantages of having the teeth properly filled before decay has rendered extraction a necessity. The expression upon the countenance would seem to indicate a dread of the operation. Thousands have exclaimed when about to pass through a similar ordeal, 'Oh that I had attended to my teeth, and had them filled in time.' W. H. GROSS, Dentist, guarantees for 300 years, all fillings inserted by him, and will re-fill without extra charge any that may fall inside of that time. He uses Gold, Silver and all other filling materials possessing any merit. Get your teeth filled in time, and thus guard against the necessity of having them extracted. Don't forget the name of place.
