Proct that they were under the protion of a young man who " jus' made oney hand over fist"; and Claire, beving this handsome falsehood, let sie talk with her gallant while she relapsed into silence. They were all on the forward deck of o steamboat, close against its wooden siling. Claire was a little apart from er companions; she had instinctively withdrawn from them. The night had w woven its web to the full. Overhad the stars beamed more richly: elov, the black river shimmered with llassy lustre where it mot the sides of ne speeding vessel, and then rolled off gain into darkness with great swollen aves. Long points of light pierced gloom below the opposite shore, like olden plummets that were slowly thoming its opaque tide. Here and there scarlet or green lights noved over the waters, given by the lewiese barquesthat bore them the look of weird, wandering, jack-o'-lanterns.

These were simply fantastic. They held no human analogies. A sloop, thus brilliantly docked, hove on a sudden into sight, not many yards from Claire's peoping gaze. Its expanse of convast, tense in the sharp breeze, caught a momentary unearthly paller; it slipped into view like a menstrons phantom, and like a phantom it vanished again.

This, too, was a merely elfin and quaint apparition; no sense of vital reality lay behind it. But the journeying ferry boats, that voyaged to their several goals on either side of the river, took, with their curved lines of small, keen-lit windows, and their illuminations at various other points, the like-ness of stately galleys gliding after nightfall to some opnient port. All their horrors of nantical architecture were deadened by merciful shadow.

Claire felt the quiet splender of the inggestion. Her varied educational past made this fully possible. But the whole effect of transformation of magic, of mystery, and of beauty, which follows the advent of night along all the watery environs of our great metropolis, appealed to her with deep force.

She had a fancy that the hard prose had left her life forever; that she was now being softly swept into luxurious and romantic surroundings; that the fertal and poetic look of city and river symbolized a fairer and kindlier future. The inclulgence of this fancy thrilled her delightfully; it was a sort of intoxication; she felt no longer culpable. notified; she leaned her graceful young head far over the boat-rail, as though to gain by this act a stronger intimacy with the sweet, drowsy sorceries that encompassed her.

"My l ain't it reef chilly out here though?" said Josie. "We'd ought to a' staid inside, hadn't we, Miss Twining ?" This half broke the spell with Claire. I like it so much better out here," she answered. "The air isn't too sharp for me, and then everything is so beautiful and strange." She slightly waved one hand toward the brilliant city, as she spoke.

Josie did not understand at all. How could there be anything beautiful in a lot of hoats screaming to each other after dark with steam whistles. But she said "yes," and cast a glance at Mr. MacNab, which was meant to veto in him the first symptom of surprise. Claire's superiority must not have the least slight east upon it. It would never do to encourage Mr. MacNab in undervaluing the compliment of her companionship.

The boat soon landed, and Claire's lovely illusions fled. Still, here was the city, poisy, populous, alluring. After disembarking at the ferry they were yet far away from Niblo's, and a long ride ensued, in a car crowded and of illodor. Then came a walk of considerable length, fleetly taken, for they were a little late by Mr. MacNab's silver timepiece, which afterwards proved to be

Mr. MacNab was meanwhile in a a sort of nervons trance. He had made what for him was a tour de force in mental arithmetic, though he still remained insecure about the exactitude of his calculation.

However, he felt cortain of one thing: three seats, of a certain kind, would mong our consisties of immigration, cost three dollars. A dollar would olidly remain to him, though the precise amount of surplus change now in his pocket defied all his mathematical modes of discovery.

Pride forbade that he should take out the silver bits and count them. But his residual dollar could at least pay the homeward fares. Cold as this comfort may have been, it took, no doubt a certain degree of warmth when contrasted with pecuniary exposure.

They at length reached the theatre, and easily procured up-stair seats that commanded an excellent view of the stage. The curtain had not yet risen. Claire was glad of that, she had the desire not to miss a single detail of the coming performance. She was intently examining her play-bill, when, on a sudden, a man's voice, close at her right, spoke to this effect:

" Hello, Jimmy, is that yerself?" The next moment Claire perceived & hand and arm to have been unceremonionsly thrust in front of her, while a young man leaned his body very much ideways indeed. She recoded, herself, not without annoyance. Josic sat next to her, and then came Mr. MacNab, who now permitted himself to be shaken hands with across the laps of the two girls.

"Hello, Jack." he responded at the ome time, "What you doin' here?"

"Come t' see the show," said the person called Jack. 1 1 s think to " Course. Nuthin' strange bout it, is there?" "That's all right." "S'pose you're on the same racket yerself. Hey?" "You bet, ole boy."

All these afterances were exchanged in tones of the most easy cordiality. The two young men had ceased to shake hands, but were leaving each toward he other, apparently quite unconscious t the meonvenience which they inflicte lapon both Josie and Claire. 'I got sold 't night," Jack continued with a blended wink and giggle. " flow's that ?"

Jack gave a demonstrative jerk of the elbow, meant to indicate a vacant seat on his further side. "Me an' my gal was comin' t'gether, but she gimme the sip after I'd got mer seats. Sent word she had the headache. Well, I dunne how t is, but I reckon I'll have to punch some feller's head, fore long. Hey, Ji.omy ?" This hostile prophecy was hailed by Jimmy with a laugh whose repressed enjoyment took the semblance of a goose's hiss, except that it's tone was moreguttural, and its volume more mas

" I guess that's bout the size of it, fack," he replied. The next moment he straightened himself in his seat. having received an exasperating nudge from Josie.

Mr. MacNab's friend followed his example. Claire felt relieved. She examined her programme again. She had already managed to see quite as much as she wished of the person seated next her.

His name was Slocumb. He had a cousin in Greenpoint, an undertaker's son, whom he would occasionally visit of a Sunday, bringing across the river to the doleful quarters of his kinsfolks a demeaner of high condescension or patron-

He was in reality a loafer of very victors sort, feeding his idleness upon trived to hide his real budness of life and lowness of repute from both uncle and cousin, and had won the letter to believe him a superior kind of metropolitan product. Together MacNab and he had partaken of refreshment at the shop of the former's employer, and from such events had sprung an intimacy with the cyster-opener which had found its most active development in a near drinking-shop.

found its most active development in a near drinking-shop.

Mr. John Slocumb had a dull, brownish complexion, a light-brown eye, and a faint brown moustache. His face was not ugly, judged by line and feature, but it had a hardness that resembled bronze; you fancied that you might touch its cheek and meet no would have the property of the state of the property of the state of the property of the state of t resistance. There was a look of vice and depravity about it that was not to be explained; the repulsive element was there, but it cluded direct proof; it was no more in eyelid than in nostril, but it was as much in forehead and chin as in either. Claire felt the repel-ling force almost instantly. Mr. Slocumb's dress was not designed in a fashion to decrease its effect. He wore a suit of green-and-blue plaid, each tint being happily moderated, like evil that prefers to lurk in ambush. The collar of his shirt sloped down at the breast, leaving an unwonted glimpse of his neck visible. But you saw a good deal of his cravat, which was green, barred with broad yellow stripes, and pierced by a pin that appeared to be a hand of pink coral clutching a golden dumb-bell. His figure was slender almost to litheness, but his shoulders outspread two such long and bulky ridges that you at once placed their athletic proportions among the most courageous frauds of tailoring.

The orchestra had now begun to play a lively and rather clangorous prelude. And meanwhile Claire was gradually made to learn that Mr. John Slocumb was keeping up a cool, persistent stare at her half-averted face. She soon became troubled by this unrelaxing scrutiny, as minutes slipped by. Mr. Slocumb had a slim black cane that looked like a polished and rounded whalebone and ended in the head of a bull-dog, with two white specks of ivory for its eyes. Holding this between his knees, he flung it from one hand to another in nervous oscillation, while continuing his stare.

He had decided that Claire was a damned good-looking girl. He had a secret contempt for her escort, Mr. MacNab. He judged all men by the his own wiry frame held easy resources for the annihilation of "poor little Jimmy," 'She looks putty high-toned,' he was reflecting, 'but I guess that's on'y a put-up job to tease a feller. She can't be much if she's along with that young un. I'll say somepn."

He was on the verge of carrying out this resolve and addressing Claire, when an event occurred which had the effect of thwarting his meditated impertinence. The mind of James MacNab was dull and sluggish. But he had seen a way of perhaps securing for himself the undivided attention of Josie. He did not wait for the latter to sanction his design; he feared her opposition to it, and suddenly spoke, leaning forward again with his look directed full upon Henderson, Chas Jackman, George Meier, Minnie Mills, Aggie Knowlson, Harry Gregory, Addie Browne, Gertrade Williams, Edith Mills Mil

"Miss Twinin'," he said, " 'low me t' intrerdooce a friend 'o mine, Mr. Slocomb. Mr. Slocumb, Miss Twinin'; Miss Twinin', Mr. Slocumb."

During this penderous formula of presentation Claire had started, colored, turned toward the neighbor thus pointedly named, and finally bowed with extreme coldness, at once re-averting her face after doing so.

She seized the chance of whispering to Josie: "Why did he do that? I don't want to meet any strangers tonight. I hoped he would understand." "He'd ought to," replied Josie, in wift aside. "I do declare it's too

The next moment she addressed Mr. MacNab. Claire could not hear what she said to him, but her brisk asperity of gesture somewhat plainly denoted reprimand. Her remarks, whatever their nature, were met in stolid silence. He who received them rather enjoyed being scolded by Josie. Her wrath had the charm of exclusiveness; for the time, at least, it vouchsafed to him her unshared heed.

Sleening made prompt use of his new opportunity. "I guess we'll have a putty decent show to-night." he said. They say it lays over most ev'rything that's been here fur a year or two."

Claire was now forced to turn and look at the speaker. To ignore him was reserve dignity. He had be right of way beyond the seriers of her disregard; he had beome an authorized nuisance; civility. com herself had taken the instant snape of a debt, due her present escort. "I shall be glad if it is a good play," she said. Her tones were chill and forced; her manner was repellent because so restrained. Immediately after speaking she looked at the stage. The orchestra had just stopped its brassy tumults. The green width of curtain was slowly rolling upward. The play began. It was one of those melodramas that are the despair of reformatory critics, yet reach the protective approval of the populace through scenic novelty, swift action, and vivid, if coarse-lined, portraitures. Claire was too infrequent a theatre-goer not to promptly fall under the spell wrought by a playwright deft enough for the capture of others far more experienced than she in tricks of climax, dialogue, and situation. Occasionally, during the progress of this act, she would murniur pleased comments to Josie. She betrayed an interest that was childish; she had forgetten the proximity of Slocumb. He still stared at her; he had not been effectually repulsed by her suppressed, colorless demeauor. Her refined accent and the musical quality inseparable at all times from her voice had affected him like a new sensation. He failed to follow the actors while they diligently stored up material for future agony. He had enormous confidence in his own powers of fascination with women. It did not occur to him that Claire might be a lady. He knew nothing of ladies. He had met some women who disliked him at sight, who would have none of him, whose fortresses of prejudice he could not storm. But these incidents quests far outnumbered them. "She's playin' off," sped his further reflections, once more shaped in the vernacular of actual speech. "I'll let the alms of an infatuated woman, whose devotion he did not repay with even the saving grace of fidelity. He had con-
