THE JESUIT DEBATE. HON. D. MILLS'S SPEECH IN THE COMMONS.

Masterly Review of the Question—The Ministerial Tactics—Provincial Rights Involved—The Constitutionality of the Measure—The Old Elizabethan Laws -Late English Opinions and Prece-

[From the official parliamentary report.] Hon. Mr. MILLs(Bothwell) -- I have watchd with attention the proceedings in this debate, not with more attention to what has been said by hon, gentlemen who have taken part in the debate than to the manner in which it has so far been conducted. I think, since I have had a seat in parliament, I do not know of any subject which has come before the house that has exhibited the tactical skill of the hon. the first minister to greater advantage than this discussion. The hon, gentleman finds himself face to face with what may become a dangerous agitation, involving the administration of which he is the head. That agitation was begun by a journal conducted with more than ordinary ability, and characterized by what may be called a spirit of aggressive Protestantism; and it has gradually drawn to its side a large portion of the press of this country, and a very great deal of discussion adverse to the conduct of the government has taken place in public meetings at several places in the province of Ontario. Well, the hon. gentleman, in order to meet the dangers of the position, seems to have divided his forces in order that he may be in a position to control both sides. He has appointed his lieutenants-the hon, the minister of justice to lead one section of the hon. gentleman's forces and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to lead another section of those forces. So the hon, gentleman has made such arrangements as to bring back to the support of the government any that might be inclined to go astray. If they are dissatisfied with the conduct of the all information required from the first minister, they are at all events not dissatisfied with the position taken by his

ardent and faithful supporter, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Now, the business of each of these two distinguished lieutenants is to look carefully after his own division of the grand conservative army, and I have no doubt that these two hon. gentleman have, in SPRING SHOW that these two non, gentleman have, in the estimation of their friends, discharged the duties assigned to them by their chief with a great deal of ability and a great deal of skill; and I am sure that the hon. gentleman must feel equally grateful to his colleague, the minister of justice, and to his supporter, the hon. member for North Simcoe. This is not the only feature of this discussion worthy of notice. There is the hon member for Muskoka, (Mr. O'Brien), who moves this resolution, and makes a very ardent and somewhat unreasonable Protestant speech, and there is excepted how gentleman who so far as is another hon, gentleman, who, so far as I know since I have been in parliament, has never been found voting against the has never been found voting against the administration, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), who is put up to answer the other ardent supporter of the government, the hon. member for Muskoka. Then, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), speaking after these hon. gentlemen, and after the hon. the deputy speaker (Mr. Colby), tells the house that he will not take the trouble to answer the arguments which were adhouse that he will not take the trouble to answer the arguments which were addressed to the house by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). He tells us that that hon. member does not fear his constituents, because he never expects to return to them, that he is soon to go to his reward, that he has in this house no abiding-place, that his labors as a supporter of the administration in this house are drawing to a close, and that every day are drawing to a close, and that every day he is pitching his tent a day's march nearer the place where he expects to be. The hon, gentleman expects, according to the information afforded to the house by the hon, member for North Simcoe, soon to be gathered, not to his fathers, but to to be gathered, not to his fathers, but to the fathers where scrap books will be no longer required and where all anxiety as to the future of an election will be dispensed with. That is the position presented to the house by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in regard to the hon. member for Lincoln. Then the hon member for North Simcoe told us of the position of another supporter of the government, the deputy speaker of this house (Mr. Colby). He told us that the roseate speech of the deputy speaker, in regard to the perfect harmony existing between the two sections of the population in the province of Quebec, was due to thankfulness either for favors received or for those which were to come. The hon.

for those which were to come. The hon, member said the deputy speaker was expectant of future promotion, but the hon, gentleman did not wish to hear from a minister in futuro, but from one who was actually in possession of the treasury benches. actually in possession of the treasury benches.

Sir John A. Macdonald.—He did hear it. Mr. Mills (Bothwell).—In fact, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) gives a representation of the deputy speaker which reminds me of a statement in Lord Beaconsfield's "Endymion." In describing one of the characters in that book, the author says he had a feeling in his bosom which he was not very sure was gratitude or indigestion; and so the hon. member for North Simcoe says that the able speech made by the deputy speaker was actuated by some motive, either of favor already received or of favor to be received from the government, but he was not very sure which. Now the hon. member for North Simcoe, while he describes the motives which actuated those with whom he is associated on that side and the feeling which induced them to speak in support of the position of the government, failed to give us any information as to the motives by which he was actuated himself. I do not say that the hon. gentleman was looking forward to a seat upon the treasury benches. I do not know that such a position would have any attractions for him. It is quite possible that it might not have, but I remember very well the support which that hon, gentleman has given the government in past sessions. I remembered that railway commission bill which was introduced and supported by one who stood so near the prime minister year by year, by which the commission bill which was introduded and supported by one who stood so near the prime minister year by year, by which the Grand Trunk was paralyzed and the in-terests of the Canadian Pacific Railway were promoted, and I cannot bring myself to believe that the hon, gentleman would have taken the position he has in support of the amendment of the hon, member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) if he thought the government had any serious objection to the proposal he made. The hon, gentleman not only failed to give us any information with regard to his own motives of action, but he failed to make any allusion to the speech of an hon, gentleman who sup-mation with regard to his own motives of action, but he failed to make any allusion to the speech of an hon. gentleman who supported the amendment, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). Now, that the hon. gentleman has been in this house a very ardent supporter of the administration, how is it that the hon. gentleman on this question arrays himself, along with the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in opposition to the course that the government has seen proper to pursue upon this bill? Sir, rumor has gone abroad that the hon gentleman is not without aspirations for a seat upon the treasury benches; rumor has gone abroad that a round robin has been sent along the back benches on that side of the house in the hon. gentleman's interests, asking the government to find a place for him upon the treasury benches. It is said that the scarlet robe of the minister of customs has become somewhat faded by his long sitting upon the treasury faded by his long sitting upon the treasury benches, and that he is no longer a fitting representative of a very large section of the Protestant population of the province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all the province of the province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all the province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all the province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all the province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all the province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all the province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all the province of Ontario; and so it is proposed—at all the province of Ontario; and other province of Ontario; and Ontario; an events, it is rumored—to recuperate that section of the government by adding the hon, member for West York (Mr. Wallace) Well, sir, the hon, member for West York is opposing the administration of which so many of his friends desire that he should become a member. The hon, mem-ber shakes his head. I have no doubt that he is sincere in that shake. I do not think he is sincere in that shake. I do not think the hon gentleman feels that he is opposing the administration; I do not think he feels that by giving the vote he intends to give in support of the motion of the hon. member for Muskoka, he is doing any detriment to the government of which he wishes to become an important member. The hon, gentleman no doubt feels that as all roads lead to Rome, as it is said, so all lines of action upon this motion, on that side of the house, will lead toward the treasury benches because they are alike intended to protect and strengthen the right hon, gentleman and strengthen the right hon. gentleman and those associated with him in the govern-ment of this country. I think the hon-member for West York is quite right and perhaps quite consistent, in his support of the administration by supporting the motion of the hon member for Muskoka rather than the motion of the minister of finance. We have had the two sides of the government presented on this question The hon, member for North Simcoe talked of the two sides of the shield, and I never saw an instance in which there were two sides to a political shield more manifest and, I may say, more admirably presented, than they have been on this occasion. Although we may admire the hon minister of incition for the years able speech he made of justice for the very able speech he made on one side, and the hon. member for North Simcoe for the very ardent speech he made on the other, I think we must after all give credit to the skill and generalship of the Von Moltke who leads this house. This, Mr. Speaker, is a sort of introduction to the new plan of cam-

is not part of the bill
Mr. Mills—which the government have presented. The introduction is not without interest. Of course when, in a novel ence, it is always interesting to those who understand it, and who are looking on. and who are anxious to see how it wil end. Sir, the minister of justice last night made a very exhaustive speech in defence made a very exhaustive speech in defence of the action of the government, a speech in almost every word of which I cordially concur. When the hon gentleman had completed that speech the hon, premier was ready for a division. He did not see any necessity for any further discussion upon the subject. It had been fully and exhaustively discussed. Both sides of the government shield had been presented to the house The government had made their defence before the country, and they say to the electors, You can follow the minister of justice and support the government, or of justice and support the government, or you can take the other side and follow the non. member for North Simcoe and support the government; and so, whichever way the matter may be arranged, it comes way the matter may be arranged, it comes to supporting the government after all. It is like the trade between the hunter and the Indian It is you take the owl and I will take the turkey, or I will take the turkey and you take the owl. It goes to the government, no matter what the choice may be. Well, sir, the prime minister was no doubt ready for a division, but we were not, and is it to be wondered at? I expect, at all events and no doubt the vast majority on the side of the house expect, to support the government. But expect, to support the government. But when one is in questionable company he always feels obliged to make some defence or explanation of his conduct; and I feel it necessary, in view of the character of the gentlemen with whom I am to be associated in this vote, to give some account and some justification to the public for the sourse I intend to pursue. Now we on this side of the house feel that this is a very important question. It is one which is calculated to arouse religious feeling, and religious prejudice; it is one in respect of which men, if they once become permeated with it, are likely to throw reason to the winds; and therefore in this incipient stage—if that incipient stage of the excitement and controversy is not passed it is important that the opposition, as well as the members of the government, should have an opportunity of assigning to the public what is a sufficient reason for their own justification and which I think will be regarded as a sufficient reason by the great mass of those who support them, in the course which they intend to adopt on this occasion. We have had most of the speaking done on one side. Our business in this discussion, Mr Speaker, is to stand up for the right, to allay, so far as we can, the popular excitement, to correct the popular misapprehension as to the nature of the question put in issue by this bill—not become mere weathercocks which will indicate the strength of the gale which may be blowing from this or that particular direction. I have and I have no doubt that every gentleman on this side of the house has, too much respect for the good sense and the good intentions of the people to undertake to convert this Jesuit's Estates bill into a sort of Ginx's baby for the purpose of creating religious excitement and religious animosities throughout the country. So, for these reasons, we propose fully to discuss this question, and I think the time occupied in such a discussion is not wasted. There is one advantage amongst the many disadvantages of popular excitement, that under it people are more likely to listen, they are more likely to give attention to what is said, and you have an opportunity of imparting to them information upon a subject which they would not be likely to receive under other circumstances. That being the case, I Continued on 6th page. is not passed it is important that the opposition, as well as the members of the

THE JESUIT ESTATES BILL. — At the Orange tea-meeting held here the other night in connection with the new ladge in Galway, the following resolution was moved by Mr. H. Graham, seconded by Mr. F. Train, that this meeting give a standing vote of thanks to the Noble Thirteen for the stand they took in order to have the Jesuits estates bill disallowed; and we deeply regret the course that both political parties took when the vote was taken. The chairman consulted High Grand Master Sam Hughes, and though it was quite clear the meeting was strongly in favor of it Sam was afraid to have the motion put, and tried to make it appear a political motion and out of place. A great many were greatly surprised at Sam's change of front; but as a veteran brother remarked Sam has only joined the lodge a year or two and we must not expect too much from him.

THE LINDSAY SLANDERER REBUKED.—
For the sake of venting his ill-will upon Mr. J.
A. Barron, M.P., it is not necessary that Sam.
Hughes should insult a Mrs. S. — of this locality. We learn that his anger and madenvy leads him into lying and slandering against all with whom he comes in contact, but we supposed his indecent mind was not so low as to arrag in the name of a Burnt River lady to make his filthy joke (a chestnut, by the way) have the appearance of truth against Mr. Barron. Evidences of his coarse mind are plenty, but it was to be hoped that the woman would be left out in his coarse references. The next occasion for the Warder's reference to any of our ladies he had better omit the initial letter to the name, for Mrs. S.—'s are not so plentiful in this locality that it is unknown to whom he points his story. Our children are ascieanly and as nicely kept as those of ladies in the town of Lindsay, and their linen is not such as to give the "horror of horrors" to any man or woman of the finest sensibilities. Some Kind Words,—The Orillia News-Letter of last week says: "The success of the popular husiness firm in these days is largely due to experience and foresight on the part of the proprietor who personally supervises every detail. As a case in point we refer to J. T. Porter & Co., the original bankrupt stock dealers, Orillia, who, ever on the alert, we know for a fact have now over 150 barrels of sugar lying in Toronto and Hamilton bought at the lowest point sugars reached before the present rise, which keeps daily advancing. At present these sugars are worth two cents a pound more than when bought, with prices still going up. There is therefore no house in orillia that is in as good a position to sell you good sugars cheap as is this wonderful bargain house. The public may well wonder how it is that week after week Porter & Co. have something new in the way of extra ordinary bargains to offer, but the fact remains only to bewilder competitors with less business experience and resources. These cheap sugars will supply Mr. Porter's big trade for several weeks, and they are only in harmeny with the general bargains the firm gives to all customers, but the house is so well known and so much talked of that we need not enlarge on the subject."—41-1.

After the business on hand was disposed of the following program was given: Reading of "The Echo," the society's paper, which contained matter of a varied and high order, read by Mr. Birchard, the editor, and Miss B. M. Broad, the associate editor. An essay on "Drink," by Mr. T Westcome. The chief attraction was the debate on the question: "Resolved, that the study of history should be given greater prominence in our schools than the study of mathematics." The affirmative was maintained by Mr. P. H. Allin and Missee Broad and Finley and the negative by Rev. H. S. Anderson and Missee Allin and Mander.
