to see whether Nolen was in the rooms. In that way they both got off. We did everything in our power to stop them, but it was too late. I sincerely hoped he would think better of it, and come back.

I am sorry for you, but there it is!" "As regards myself. I'm not a loser. I don't mind telling you that, a few hours after his escape, I received by letter the amount of the bail; it came, I have reason to believe, from Martin. All Percy's outstanding bills were also paid, probably by the same hand. Of course, Percy shoul i have stood his trial, and had I had any inkling of what he intended I should have used every means to prevent his departure. But at any rate he left no debts behind him."

"He made the mistake of his life," said the inspector, emphatically. "As the reason why will be known in a few bours, I may as well tell you now. In the first place the evidence against him has not conclusive, and, taking everyhing into consideration, the chances are that he would have been acquitted. His ooks and manner and his previous recbrd and social standing were in his avor, though it is true that he had been making a fool of himself here and there. boys sometimes will. But a fellow like that is not likely to steal a lady's bocket book in face of the absolute cerainty of being suspected of it. The game wasn't worth the candle."

"I quite agree with you," replied the fudge; "still there was a possibility that the verdict might go against him; and you can understand that a conviction would be as good as death to him." "Even then, if we were innocent, the guilty party would be sure to turn up sooner or later and he would be vindicated. I could make a guess, even now, as to who the thief really is; but he has not committed himself yet, and as the money stolen was in bank notes of course It is more difficult to trace than jewels or any kind of personal property would be. But that is not the point I was going to make. If he had appeared in court today he would have been a free man ever after."

"How can you know that?" "In this way. You have heard all about that affair of his with the wife of the plaintiff. No actual harm had been done, but she was compromised and her bushand had heard of it; they had had ome words about it probably; and when e found Nolen in such an awkward predicament, he naturally was not going to ose the opportunity of jumping on him. o he pressed the charge, as we saw. But his wife did what he had not anticiated-she joined him in the accusation. and thereby ranged herself definitely on his side. Of course that took the wind out of his sails; it proved that she hated Percy as much as he did, and therefore semoved his own chief reason for hating on sober second thought, that he had committed the crime, he would begin it ask himself how the public trial would affect his wife and himself. And he first thing he would see would be that he would involve letting out the whole story of the flirtation. Now, if his wife had persisted in her folly, instead of acting the part of a virtuous cur, as she did, he might have been willing to have her shown up; but as it was, he would desire to hush it up as securely as possible. to hush it up as securely as possible. There was only one way to do that, and that was"-"Ah! I see. The plaintiff would decline to prosecute?" "Exactly, and that (as I have the best reason for knowing) is just what he has done. His counsel are instructed to withdraw the charge; and of course, under the circumstances, the judge would allow him to do so. But when they see that the prisoner is not on hand, it may cause them to modify this course. They might profess themselves ready to go on with the case, and as the prisoner is absent judgment would issue against

"It is that result that I hoped to avoid. It would be a sad thing for an honorable family to be dragged through the dust in this way for a crime for which the accused is not responsible."

"He should have had the manliness to face his accusers," repeated the inspec-tor. "No one knows better than you, judge, that in this world a man must defend himself. He cannot expect other people to find excuses for him. But, as say, he may live it down; he is a young fellow yet, and"-

"Have you seen this morning's paper?" interposed the judge. "I have looked through it. Is there anything particular?" The judge held out the paper, with his finger on a certain paragraph. The in-pector took it and read as follows:

"A terrible hurricane is reported as having occurred in the neighborhood of St. Thomas, W. I., on the 13th ult. It is described as the severest ever known in those latitudes. It was preceded in the morning by a dead calm and excessive heat. Early in the afternoon weatherwise persons predicted a heavy blow. The prophecy was soon verified.

"Clouds were observed collecting in the southwest; they rapidly increasd in size and darkness, and advanced toward the northeast, from which quarter a gentle breeze was blowing. The storm burst with terrific fury. The harbor of St. Thomas is a large basin, the entrance to which is a comparatively narrow passage between two headlands. The harbor was at the time filled with shipping, including several steamers and large vessels. One of the steamers was at the time taking on passengers; the captain gave orders that this should be stopped, and steamed out of the harbor in the hope of weathering the gale. The steamer has not since been heard of, but fragments of it have been picked up at sea, and there is no doubt that she perished with all on board. The storm was accompanied by intense darkness, greater than that of ordinary midnight without moon caused was terrible. "After blowing for a couple of hours from the southwest it hauled about and blew with equal violence from the northout of the water and carried inland. One large merchant ship was taken up bodily and planted in the midst of a warehouse near the shore. The houses of the town were unroofed and in most cases annihilated. Upwards of four hundred lives were reported lost, and the harbor was full of corpses, which were devoured by the sharks. One of the most remarkable episodes of this disastrous storm was that of the U.S. and B. Co.'s steamship Amazon. She was due at St. Thomas on the day after that on which the hurricane occurred. She had cleared from New York with six passengers and a full cargo. She had fair weather up to within two hundred miles of St. Thomas, and was somewhat ahead of her schedule time. According to the narration of the survivors, she met the hurricane about " o'clock on the afternoon of the 18th. She was put about so as to run before the gale. The wind and waves almost immediately dismasted her, and it was found impossible to do more than keep her before the wind, even this taxing all the powers of those on board. At one time she was pooped by a heavy sea which broke into the forecastle and swept many overboard. "When the wind veered about the steamer became virtually unmanageable; she drove before the gale, and it was expected that she must founder. But after several hours she was suddenly beached; and on the storm breaking it was distinct the table all the variety she can lay her and on the storm breaking it was discovered that she was lying in the main street of St. Thomas, close to her own dock. In the darkness she must have days ago. She was spending the day been driven through the narrow entrance with one of her neighbors, and noticed of the harbor, and so across to the town. avoiding by a miracle numberless obstacles. She is, however, a complete wreck, and half her ship's company were swept overboard and drowned, while many of the others have received severe injuries. Of the six passengers who were on board the following are killed: Alfred Harper, went insane and washed overboard; Charles Tupper, neck broken; James Blair, washed overboard; Percy Nolen, washed overboard. The surviving passengers are Herbert Simpson and Valentine Martin. Mr. Martin occupied the same state room with Mr. Nolan, and is much affected by his death. He says he saw him shortly before the time when the steamer was pooped; he was on his way to the forecastle, under the impression, it is supposed, that there was greater security there than in the

Zealand, near Napier."

Having read thus far, the inspector laid down the paper, and stroked his chin awhile with a meditative air. "So the young man is drowned, is he?" he said, at length. "The account seems to look that way."

"Do you mean there can be any doubt about it?" exclaimed the judge.

FARM AND FIRESIDE.

Fattening Foods for Broilers. "A Farmer's Daughter" contributes the following practical article on this impertant subject to the Country Gentlemam: A few weeks before the chicks have grown to their natural size suitable to be used as broilers for the family table, their rations should consist of the most fattening foods the house wife can command. At this age they are more disposed to grow than to fatten. Nature works first for size and maturity and then for beauty and symmetry. Fat is reseve fuel which the animal, (I mean all animals), lays by ia various places in the body to be called into use for making heat in the event that the regular supply should be wanting, and growing animals do not think this is their time to lay by this reserve, so they approprpate all the spare nutriment which their food contains to growth. But it is possible to feed half-grown chicks as well as all other animals so plentifully upon fattening foods that they are compelled to fatten more or less. And here the various foods furnished by the farm, garden, dairy, kitchen, diningroom, and the neighboring mills, divide themselves into two classes heretofore alluded to; the one more disposed to fatten, and the other tending to promote

It is the fattening food that we are now looking for. At the head of the list stands indian corn, in all its various preparations as food for man, as well as the lower animals. Corn leads even wheat in quantity and cheapness. America has in quantity and cheapness. America has given it to the world, and I notice that within the last few months there has been a largely increased exportation to the eastern continent. Whoever is unacquainted with the origin of maize should go straightway and read Longfellow's Hiawatha, and ever afterwards the plain corn meal hoe-cake will have a richer and more delicious flavor.

The farmer estimates his latent resources by his corn crop; a full corn crib is to him what a large bank account is to the merchant-something to invest in order to bring in more. He knows that an abundant supply of corn keeps his workstock strong and able, gets the beeves ready for early market, and makes fat hogs in the fall. And all this should teach his wife that corn will have the same effect upon her young chickens. But corn, whole grains, parched or crush. ed, made into bread or mush, should be supplemented with such other fattening foods as she can supply.

Rice also ranks very high in this list, being composed mostly of starch. All foods having a preponderence of starch or or stars. The wind's relocity was estimated to reach no less than two hundred their tendency. A small quantity of whose house he entered ostensibly for the purpose of doing husiness. She though miles an hour, and the destruction it cheap molasses used for this purpo e alone and unprotected, managed to escape would have a good effect. Of course all from her assailant and found her husband table scraps are the legitimate property of the fowls. And I have used in this east. All the shipping in the harbor was direction quite a lot of very fine peach-destroyed, and several vessels were lifted blows this spring, cooking meshing and blows this spring, cooking, mashing, and mixing them in with other foods more nitrogenous. For foods poor in one element should be supplemented with others that would help to make of the whole a well-balanced ration.

When the chicks are left to scuffle and forage for their living, at one time they are nipping the grass, and at another scratching for worms and bugs. The theory of the "survival of the fittest" has full opportunity to develop itself here, and it would seem that a splendid race of fowls would be produced, for only the most vigorous are able to live, but unfortunately these few are so busy warding off starvation that they have no time either to grow or to get fat. And while the active little birds bear the semblance of chickens, providentially cevering them-selves with feathers very early in life, they seldom acquire a respectable size or are profitable to their owner either for the table or to be kept for breeding pur-

While grass is the most healthful food an animal can feed upon, it is about the poorest; being only an intermediate stage between the mineral and the grain form-ation, it has not the fattening quality of the grain, just as in this respect the grain is inferior to the fats and care, both animal and vegetable.

But the busy country housekeeper, who has no time to study agricultural that the baked chicken at the head of the table was so large that it quite filled the dish and was sufficient to help each plate liberally all round the board.

"Why is it," she asked, "that one of your chickens goes nearly as far as a tur-key, while it takes two of mine to do the

"I feed my chicks early and often," her neighbor answered, "while you feed yours occasionally, and whenever it is convonient to do so, and although I do not put out nearly so many chicks durin the season as you do, yet I take care to push them along and keep them fat aud make them grow fast at the same time."

One of these ladies appreciated the value of a fat jucy young chicken, and reasoned that it would take less time to dress one for the table than two. The other argued that it was more economical to put out a greater number of chicks and stern.

"Mr. Martin left for Vera Cruz yesterday. It is his intention to return by way of Aspinwall to his sheep farm in New by the fact that adult fowls degenerated by the fact that adult fowls degenerated in size very fast, and the young chicks have to be so old before they are large amough to eat that they are akinny and long-legged, and their meat is tough and tasteless. Then, too, there is a steady complaint of scarcity of eggs, and the housekeeper always declares that her hens are the latest to begin to sit in the spring of any in the neighborhood.

So we see that our domestics in the poultry yard, as well as those in the stock bash and pasture fields, are just what we choose to make them.

PERSONAL.—Rev. Mr. McKinnon has decided to have a holiday to himself. Since he commenced his university studies eight years ago he has had only one month's vacation. We are sure no one will feel like denying him his well-earned holiday. We hope that it will afford him much pleasure, as no doubt it will; but what will be the chief pleasure of his vacation we can at present only conjecture. To those who may feel a little nervous on this point let me say that if he (Mr. McKinnon) is qualified to instruct us in matters at iritual and temporal, as we believe he is, he will surely do right himself while he is away, and people anywhere near his own age will be quite safe in following his example.

HE Lost His Wife.—A last Friday night's Boston despatch says: Wednesday last Michael Scuily, a mindle-aged Toronto man, accompanied by his wife, arrived here and stopped at an unknown cheap hotel in the north end. The man had with him the address of a friend residing in the Roxbury district, and started out early Friday morning to visit him. He left his money with his wife and was put on a street car by an employee of the hotel and found his friend all right. When, however, he started to return he suddenly remembered that he had forgotten to write down the name and address of the hotel, and even could not tell the horse car line and even could not tell the horse car line he had come in. He vainly searched for the lost hotel until night overtook him. Tired and nearly dead with hunger, he took a citizen into his confidence and was directed to the nearest police station. The directed to the nearest police station. The latter failed utterly to get even a description of the hotel from him, and the police are now taking him to all the north end hotels in rotation to see if he will recognize the right one. He is terribly distressed, and fears that his wife will think he has abandoned her, and that she will go back to Toronto without him. He spends most of his time in crying over his lost most of his time in crying over his lost spouse and money.

A New View of the Jesuit Question.

—The Rev. R. N. Grant made an incidental allusion to the Jesuit question in his sermen Sunday morning. His text were the words "Awake, awake, put on thy strength O Zion." He considered a number of the elements of strength in the church of God,—money, organization, intelligence, unity, elements of strength in the church of God,

—money, organization, intelligence, unity, aggressiveness, the bible, a properly equipped ministry, and last and most important of all the power of the Holy Spirit. In illustrating the point that unity is an element of strength in the church of God he said: "We hear and read a great deal in these days about the power of the Jesuits in Canada. How many Jesuit priests do you suppose there are in Canada. Just aeventy-one. About one-tenth the number of the ministers in the Presbyterian church.
About one-sixth the number of communicants in this church, for we have about of the ministers in the Presbyterian church. About one-sixth the number of communicants in this church, for we have about 420 members. Yet these people are said to control the Dominion parliament, and I don't think there can be any doubt that they control the legislature of Quebec. And, mark you, a large number of these seventy-one are not pastors, but professors of colleges and lecturers, and yet they are said to control one of the largest interests in Causda. How do you explain this? Because they are united. They present a united front, and go on and do their work quietly. No doubt they have their differences between themselves, but they know far more than to have them made public and discussed in the newspapers. They are united as one man, and they go quietly and perseveringly to work, and this is one secret of their power. Well then, if unity on the wrong side is such a powerful thing, unity on the right side must also be a powerful thing. If any congregation of four or five hundred people is united, there is simost nothing, within reason, that that congregation could not accomplish. The Jesuits know well the power that comes from united action."—[Times.
