LINDSAY, FRIDAY, JUNE 13, 1890, torn Ensilage Considered as a Food for Making Beef.

The following bulletin is by Thomas Show, professor of agriculture at the Ontario agric iltural college: The idea that beefing animals cannot be fed at a profit his been protty generally indulged in of late, owing to the relatively low prices obtained for some time past compared with the an of former years. The expertment an lucted at this institution last winter with the utmost care and precision, the details of which are given below, happily disprives the correctness of this

I'm good shorthorn grade steers, two and three years old, were purchased and brought to the farm October 19, 1889. The price paid for them was $500, which wis a little extreme, owing to the deficulty of cotting a uniform lot, and for other reas us. They were sold 16th May is a very simple remedy, and one which blowing for shipment to Britain for should be remembered for an emergency $47.30, or an advance of $397.30, the price received being bio. per pound live To be

From the date of their arrival at the firm until the close of the year they did ist much more than pay for the food fed them, because of the imperfect facilities for feeding, arising from the unfinished state of the new buildings.

Six of the ten, all three years past, were selected for a feeding centest which commenced 31st December, 1889, and closed 3th April, 1890, thus histing 119 days. The primary object of the test was to secretain the value of corn ensilage and med for boof making as compared with (a) corn ensilage, hay and meal, and (b) tota, bay and meal, the fation usually

Group 1, comprising lots 1 and 2, were each fed an average of 79.4 lb. of ensinge per day, and 127 lb, of meal. There was left uneaten of the ensilage 18 b. per day of the coarser portions, but the whole amount fol was charged squinst

Group 3, comprising lots 5 and 6, were fed daily 14 3 lb. hay, 41,6 lb. roots and 12.7 lb. meal.

The meal consisted of equal parts by weight of peas, barley and oats, and was always mixed with the other food. The hay (clovery and not extra in quality) was out and mixed with the other food, and the foots were pulped and mixed likewise. The food was fed in three feeds daily, and water was virtually given in the stall. Everything given except bedding and water was accurately weigh-

The bedding used was estimated at 15 Ib. per head per day, and charged as worth $1.50 per ton in the barn.

The labor estimated on the assumption that one attendant at $25 per month would feed and care for 40 head as ordinarily fed; that $2.50 per week would pay for the additional outlay in assisting the said laborer in outting, grinding and pulping the food, and that the additional help in preparing the food in this contest be charged at half this rate, on the ground that the encilage was already prepared.

The manure was estimated at 75 lbs. per day per head, and valued at $1.50 per ton, as the standard value of manure made from ordinary stock is usually put at $1 per ton in the yard.

-Obstinate none bleeding is frequently one of the most difficult things to check. Several aggravated cases have lately occured at the hospital of the university of Pennsylvania. The size of the piece of lime is immaterial, as the water will only take up so much of it. Keep this jar in a cool, dark place and use as it is needed. A teaspoonful of this in a cup of milk is an excellent remedy for children's summer complaint and it has no bad taste. It prevents milk from ourdling when heated, and is therefore a most useful article to put in puddings and pies. A little of it taken in milk of water is good for acidity of the stomach, and a small amount of it put into milk or cream will prevent it from turning sour so soon.

tions, his wealth and his social standing. the door was opened, and he was some-thing mere than welcomed, said the gos-sipe at the Surf house. What his past history had been, where and how his life had been spent, were matters of less consequence, apparently, than what he was now. He had been wild at college, as other boys had been, she learned; he had tried the cattle business in the west, she was told; but there had been a quarrel with his father, a reconciliation, devoted mother, a long sojourn abroad-Heidelberg—a sudden summons to re-turn, the death of the father, and then the management of a valuable estate fell

There were other children, brother and steters, three in all, but Steven was the first bern and the mother's glory. She was with him at the seaside, and the first thing that moved Nellie Travers to As to increase in weight and daily cost like him was his devotion to that white woman who seemed so happy in Between that mother and Mrs. there had speedily sprung up an tance. She had vastly admired and during the first fortnight of sit to the Surf house had shown ly attentions. The illness of a r called her away, and Mrs. Rayounced that she, too, was going re, when Mr. Van Antwerp returned, and Mrs. Rayner it was so late in the season had better remain until it was go to town. In October they fortnight in the city, staying at stminster, and he was assiduous attentions, taking them everyand lavishing flowers and bonon Nell. Then Mrs. Van Antited them to visither at her own able, old fashioned house down town, and Mrs. Rayner was eager to accept, but Nellie said no, she would not do it; she could not accept Mr. Van Antwerp; she liked, admired and was attracted by him, but she felt that love him she did not. He was devoted, but had tact and patience, and Mrs. Rayner at last yielded to her demand and took her off in October to spend some time in the interior of the state with relations of their mother, and there frequently came Mr. Van Antwerp to see her and to urge his suit

They were to have gone to Warrener immediately after the holidays, but January came and Nellie had not surrendered. Another week in the city, a long talk with the devoted old mother whose heart was so wrapped up in her son's happiness, and whose arms seemed yearning to enfold the lovely girl, and Nellie was conquered. If not fully convinced frontier which she had known and loved as a child. "I want to see the mountains, had to consent. Man never urged more importunately than he that the wedding should come off that very winter; but Nellis once more said no. She could not and would not listen to an earlier date than the summer to come. No one on earth knew with what sore foreboding and misery he let her go. It was something that Mrs. Rayner could not fielp remarking-his unconquerable aversion to every mention of the army and of his own slight experience on the frontier. He would not talk of it even with Nellie, who was an enthusiast and had spent two years of her girlhood almost under the shadow of Laramie Peak and loved the mere mention of the Wyoming streams and valleys. In her husband's name Mrs. Rayner had urged him to drop his business early in the spring and come to them for a visit. He declared it was utterly impossible. Every moment of his time must be given to the settling of estate affairs, so that he could be a free man in the summer. He meant to take his bride abroad immediately and spend a year or more in Europe. These were details which were industriously circulated by Mrs. Rayner and speedily became garrison property. It seemed to the men that in bringing her sister there engaged she had violated all precedent to begin with, and in this instance, at least, there was general complaint. Mr. Blake said it reminded him of his early boyhood, when they used to take him to the great toy stores at Christmas: Look all you like, long for it as much as you please, but don't touch." Merton and Royce, of the cavalry, said it was simply a challenge to any better fellow to cut in and cut out the Knickerbocker; and, to do them justice, they did their best to carry out their theory. Both they and their comrades of the Riflers were assiduous in their attentions to Miss Travers, and other ladies, less favored made acrimonious comment in consequence. A maiden sister of one of the veteran captains in the -th, a damsel whose stern asceticism of character was reflected in her features and grimly illustruted in her dress, was moved to censure of her more attractive neighbor.

"If I had given my heart to a gentlenan," said she, and her manner was indicative of the long struggle which such a bestowal would cost both him and her. nothing on earth would induce me to accept attentions from any one else, not even if he were millions of miles away." But Nellie Travers was "accepting attentions" with laughing grace and enjoying the society of these young fellows immensely. The house would have been gloomy without her and "the boys," Rayner was prompt to admit, for he was ill at ease and sorely worried, while his inflammable Kate was fuming over the situation of her husband's affairs. Under ordinary circumstances she would have seen very little to object to so long as Nellie showed no preference for any one of her admirers at Warrener, and unless peevish or perturbed in spirit (Continued next week.)
