Well, well!" gr aned and grinned the Sale, "it's no use talkin' no more. Fetch the the paper, Sally; I'll go'n do it now, if I we got ter."

So the squire indicted the following costle, peculiar in more than its brevity:

"June 4, 18-. "Mr Adkins, Esq.: Sir- I have heerd that a young man

tall doseph Dyer worked to your shope et year. What did he do and how did he lo it? Leastways, what kind of a Filter is he? I put in a stamp for answer which will obleege

"Yours to command. "PAPERO TYLER." Valuate saw the letter before it went. dee's heart accorded with the season, and it beat harder than was pleasant as he ; knocked at Squire Tyler's front door, standing open for once in its life, and letting into the usually musty parlor the whole breath of June and the delicate odor of two great white rose bushes that guarded the portal on either hand and trailed their wreath of sunny blossoms, whose hearts glowed with the seffron tible of dawn, even across the quainf old intel overhead.

Sometimes all powers are propitious & lovers, true though they be, and to-night the hour and the pair might have appeared the Eumenides themselves. Mrs. Tyler, dreaming of nothing less than Joe Dyer's vicinity, was in the farther barn coercing a refractory hen, that had a will of her own and declined to accept the situation; the squire was at the post-office waiting anxiously for the mail. So Saily herself appeared through the soft duck like a glimmering blossom, and was sturned, perhaps not disagreeably, by finding herself in Joe's arms.

"Oh, Sally!" "Oh, Joe!"

And then the parlor sank into a moment's quiet as they looked at each other and-said no more. If speech was given us to conceal our feelings, they had very few to conceal, certainly; and I am inclined to think it was no.

THE SOFT DUSK.

But while they sat in this sweet silence. mite forgetful of adverse fate-possible to them as to all humanity-down the street came the squire, regret and consternation on his kind old face, holding a letter in one hand and wiping the sweat from his troubled forehead; not that it was warm, but he was agitated. He avoided the house, for he did not want to see Sally at first, and, hearing the angry somawks of the hen with which Mrs. Ty ler was engaged in single combat, he traced his wife to the barn and arrived there just as she emerged from the door, panting, but thished with victory.

"Well! I've sot her at last! Got her into a nail kag and put a milkin' stool on top. I guess she'll stay put till to-morrer, and then I'll fetch the good eggs 'n put under her."

"Kind o' smother, won't she?" suggested the humane squire.

"law, no! the hav ain't up to the bunghole, Got a letter, hev ye, there in

"Je-rus'lem! I guess I hev: 'n I wish Sally'd stayed to hum, I tell ve. I'm dead bent, in l'il ruther be hung this minnit than tell her on't. Come along into the kitchen; she ain't there, is she?"

"No; she's up stairs, I 'xpect. She seems to favor bein' alone considerable when the chores is done. I'm 'most allers sleepy, and you're up to the store, 'n there ain't no company for her. Wait a minnit, 'n I'll light the lamp."

"Oh dear!" said the squire, unfolding the letter. "It's a dreadful thing, wifedreadful, but 'taint no use to jaw about it beforehand. Here! take 'n read it : I

The superintendent had evidently thought Mr. Tyler's first question were the important one, and answered them in business fashion:

Mr. Paphro Tyler: "Six - Yours of the 4th came to hand this morning. I have recently come to this place, but find on inquiry that Joseph Dver worked here a year ago. He was a forger, and a good workman; of his personal character I know nothing.

"Yours, etc., T. Aprins."
"Goodness gracious!" exclaimed Mrs. Tyler, dropping the letter in her lap and ooking aghast at her husband over her spectacles. "A forger! Why, it's a hangin' business, ain't it?"

"I b'lieve 'tain't now, but anyway it's state prison. Jest to think on't!" "It's dreadful! dreadful! husband: 'n we've got to tell Sally! Well, she's had a great escape, 'n she'd oughter be thank-

"I guess that'll be the least part on't, takes good wages here, and we think | gr wied the squire, passing his hand across the singgy evebrows as if to brush away a mist. "Fetch the lamp, wife; the entry's mighty dark. I'll go'n call

> The squire opened the kitchen door, and Mrs. Tyler followed, but their steps were arrested by a strange sound in that house. From the parior door flowed a stream of low talk, sweet as the kissing whispers that ripple behind a canoe silently paddaled across silent water, and broken here and there with bubbles of laughter. The squire looked at his wife and advanced manfully, taking the light in his own hand. Therein the flood of light the rising moon poured in at open windows, sat Sally and a young man, hand in hand, on a settee-Sally blooming and dimpling and blushing in the most scrupulous and delightful manner, and the "chap" as the squire mentally styled him, so handsome and so happy that Mr. Tyler involuntarily

"Father, this is Mr. Dyer. That is mother, Joe," The squire fairly gasped with rage: "How darst you come into this house, you raskil!—a-grinnin' and imposin' round jest as though you was as good as folks! I know ye, 'n I'll hev ye hauled up in state's prison pretty quick if there's law in the land, 'nles-you clear right off."

"Oh, father!" sobbed Sally, "don't! don't! What do you talk so for."-Joe

"Talk so! Facts is facts! I've found him out; he's been and committed forgery, the everlastin' scamp!"

being as he afterwards expressed it, dumb-

Joe found his tongue and blazed:
"That's an infernal lie, whoever say

"Oh, Joe, don't!" interposed sobbing Sally—Mrs. Tyler, being for a wonder, quite silent, confessing at a later period of the evening that she "was kind o' choked up she hadn't a word to throw to a dog." "Because it is a lie, Sally, and I can't be slandered so by any man, if he is your

"Tain't no slander!" thundered the squire; "'n if it was, 'tain't me that slandered ye. I suppose you won't deny you worked to the Springfield armory a spell

"Why, no; what should I deny it for?" "Well, read that!" said the squire, charging down upon the angry and astonished young man with the letter. Joe took the paper from the hand that brandished it, and the squire held the lamp nearer. As Sally's lover read the damnatory epistle a change passed over his features (isn't that the way they say it in novele?); but it wasn't livid, or pallid or rigid, or purple, or anything but a growing broader and broader, till, as the last words were glanced at Joe flung him-self back on the old settee and burst into a roar of laughter that seemed utterly in-extinguishable. He held his sides; he rolled and twisted: he laughed so that the tears made all his ruddy cheeks shiny; he could not speak, but held out the letter to Sally. Was the girl bewitched? She too sat down in a chair and screamed with a laughter that would not be appeased. while the squire and Mrs. Tyler glared at them with wide open mouths and blank eyes, as if they had suddenly gone mad. "Oh dear! oh Lord! oh goodness! I shall split-I certainly shall!" was all the explanation that could be got from Joe. He could not talk: but Sally, not quite so tickled with the joke, because she had been so scared to begin with, recovered her equilibrium first, and, wiping her streaming eyes, began, as well as she could for still interrupting spasms of laughing, to expound:

"Why, father! Goodness! oh, don't you know what Mr. Adkins means? Oh dear! I can't stop! Why, he means Joe was a forger. Oh! there it is again! Well, he is, now. He works at a forge, and that's what they call 'em!"

Joe exploded again, and the parlor rang with the squire's roars. Mrs. Tyler was the last to comprehend, but when she did she laughed too; and when at length the four, all red and shiny, had laughed themselves out and were fairly gasping for breath, the squire turned upon

"Well, I hain't hed sech a larf, not in twenty year. I can't do nothin' but shake hands with ye for the sake on't. Got any folks in Wingfield? No? Well, ye must stay here—there's room enough -and I shall hev a better chance to see how I like ye; 'n so'll Miss Tyler. I don't know but what Sally's made up her mind."

Sally had slipped away before Joe looked round. Is it necessary to detail Joe's triumphant progress into the hearts of the family? Perhaps the best proof of it is that on one October day, "expressly ot up for the occasion when the hills were gorgeous with color, the air transfused with sunshine, and the river blue as the fringed gentians on its bank, Sally descended once more from the cars at Westboro' station-her first | The NEATEST, appearance "in the new and highly interesting character of the Forger's Bride."
