JANK SINCLAIR: OR. THE FAWN OF SPRINGDALE.

If there be one object in life that stirs the current of human feeling more sadly than mother, it is a young and lovely woman, whose intellect has been blighted by the treachery of him on whose heart, as on a shrine, she offered up the incense of her first affection. Such a being not only draws around her our tenderest and most delicate sympathies, but fills us with that mouraful impression of early desolution, resembling so much the spirit of metapeholy romance that arises from one melancholy romance that arises from one of those and and gloomy breezes which awarp unexpectedly over the sleeping surface of a summer lake, or moans with a tone of wail and sorrow through the green foliage of the wood under whose cooling whate we sink into our noon-day dream. Madness is at all times a thing of fearful mystery, but when it puts itself forth in a female gifted with youth and beauty, the pathos it causes becomes too refined for the grouness of ordinary sorrow—almost transcends our notion of the real and secures that wild interest which investe it with the dim and visionary light of the ideal. Such a malarly constitutes the very romance of affliction, and gives to the fair sufferer rather the appearance of an angel fair fallen without guilt, than that of a being moulded for mortal purposes. Whoever could look upon such a beautiful ruin without feeling the heart sink, and the mind overshadowed with a solemn darkness, as if conscious of witness-ing the still and awful gloom of that disastrons sellpes of reason, which, alas! is so often doomed never to pass away.

It is difficult to account for the mingled reverence, and terror, and pity with which we look upon the insane, and it is equally strange that in this case we approach the temple of the mind with deeper homage, when we know that the divinity has passed out of it. It must be from a conviction of this that uncivilized nations venerate deranged persons as inspired, and in some instances go so far, I believe, as even to pay them

The principle, however, is in our nature that for which our sympathy is deep and unbroken never fails to secure our compassion and respect, and ultim-stely to excite a still higher class of our moral feelings.

These preliminary observations were suggested to me by the fate of the beautiful but infortunate girl, the melancholy events of whose life I am about to communicate. I feel, indeed, that in relating them, I undertake a task that would require a pen of unexampled power and delicacy. But it is probable that if I remained silent upon a history at once so true, and so full of sorrow, no other person equally intimate with its incidents will ever give them to the world. I cannot presume to detail sunappy Jane's calamity with the pathos due to a wos so singularly thep and delicate, or to the cribe that faithful attachment which white smile of a manaio's misery. This I cannot do; for who, also, could ever hope to invest a dispensation as dark as her's with that rich tone of poetic beauty which threw its wild graces about her madness? For my part, I consider the subject not only as difficult, but sacred, and approach it on both accounts with devotion, and feer, and transling. I need scarcely inform the ranger that the names and localities are, for obvious reasons, ficti-tions, but I may be permitted to add that the incidents are substantially correct and

Jane dinoigir was that third and youngs out daughter of a discusting eleganism in one of the most interesting countles in the north of Ireland. For father was remarkable for their character which is no frequently joined to a light order of intellect and an affectionate warmth of heart. To a well-tempered seal in the onne of faith and morals, he added a practical habit of charity, both in word and deed, such se endeared him to all classes, but especially to those whose humble condition in life gave them the strongest claim upon his virtues, both as a man and a pactor. Difficult, indeed, would it be to find a minister of the gospel, whose practice and precept corresponded with such beautiful fitness, nor one who, in the midst of his own domestic circle, threw such calm lastre around him as a husband and a father. A temper grave but sweet, wit playful and innocent, and tenderness that kept his spirit benigmant to error without any compromise of duty, were the links which bound all hearts to him. Seldom have I known a Christian clergyman who exhibited in life own life so much of the unaffected character of apostolic holiness, nor one of whom ter of spoetolic holiness, nor one of whom it might be said with so much truth, that "he walked in all the commandments of the Lord blameless."

Rie family, which conststed of his wite, one son, and three daughters, had, as might be expected, inhibited a deep sense of that religion, the serene beauty of which shone so stendily slong their father's path of life. Mrs. Sinclair had been educated, and in her husband's conversation are and in her hasband's conversation and society found further opportunity of improving, not only her intellect, but her heart. Though respectably descended, she could not claim relationship with what may be emphatically termed the gentry of the country; but she could with that class so prevalent in the north of Ireland, which ranks in birtle only one grade beneath them. I say in birth;—for in all the decencies of life, in the uncestentations bounties of benevolence, in moral purity, domestic harmony, and a moral purity, domestic harmony, and a conscientious observance of religion, both in the comeliness of its forms, and the oheerful freedom of its forms, and the cheerful freedom of its spirit, this class ranks immeasurably above every other which Irleh society presents. They who compose it are not sufficiently wealthy to relax those pursuits of honorable industry which constitute them, as a people, the ornament of our nation; nor does their good serves and decent raids resembly them. good sense and decent pride permit them to follow the dictates of a mean ambition, by struggling to reach that false eleva-tion, which is as much beneath them in all the virtues that grace life as it is above them in the dazzling dissipation which renders the violation or neglect of its best duties a matter of fashionable etiquette, or the shameful privilege of high birth. To this respectable and in-dependent class did the immediate rela-tions of Mrs. Sinclair belong; and, as might be expected, she failed not to bring all its virtues to her husband's heart and household-there to southe him by their influence, to draw fresh energy from their mutual intercourse, and to shape the habits of their family into that perception of self-respect and decent propriety, which in domestic duty, dress, and general conduct, uniformly results from a fine sense of moral feeling, blended with high religious principle.
