And then Samuel McFadden felt depressed and sad, and the haughty scorn of the president and cashier cut him to the soul. He would often go out in the shippard and how his venerable twenty-four inch head, and weep gallons and gallons of tears over his insignificance and pray that he might be made worthy of the cashier's and the president's polite attention.

One night a happy thought struck him; a gleam of light burst upon his soul, and gazing down the dim vists of years, with his eyes all blinded with the mist of joyous tears, he saw himself rich, honored and respected. So Samuel McFadden fooled around and got a jimmy and a monkey-wrench, and a cross-cut saw and cold chi-sel, and a drill and about half a ton of set, and a drill and about half a ton of gunpowder and nitro-glycerine and all those things. Then, in the dead of night, he went to the fire-proof safe, and after working at it a while, burst the door and brickwork into immortal amash so that there was not enough of the safe left to make a earpet tack. Mr. McFadien then proceeded to load up with coupons and greenbucks, and currency and specie, and to nail all the odd change that was laying around any where, so that he pranced out of the hank with one millien of dollars on him. He then retured to an unasuming residence out of tewn and sent word to the detectives where he was.

It was all serenc and beautiful for Mr. It was all serene and beautiful for Mr McFadden now. He felt that it was all right at last, and that the dark nights of right at last, and that the dark nights of sorrow had passed, and the bright rays of the sun of prosperity at last illuminated his path. A detective called on him the next day with a note from the cashier. McFadden treated it with scorn. he reached Baldwin that the conductor, for Tuten, did not consider it safe to allow him to proceed further and therefore procured the services of another engineer; Drew, however, remained on the engine. When the train arrived at Sanderson, the acting engineer left the train for some purpose, when Drew, still drunk, cut loose from the train and put out the engine at lightning speed, leaving engineer, fireman, conductor, and all behind. As he neared Lake City, the section hands working on the road scattered pell-mell into the woods frightened out of their wits at the tremandous speed the engine was running. The agent at Lake City, when saked about it, said the engine was running about one hundred miles an hour, and there was a man on board, but he was certainly crany!

"Farther west a gentleman saw the engine pass, but could discover no one on her, and said he was very much alarmed; but presently he saw a hand go up, and then he knew there was a human being on board. Drew thundered along at this dangerous speed until he reached Ellaville, where he came near colliding with an eastward bound freight train. The master machinist Mr. Kennedy, happened to be here, and flinging the manine sugineer from the engine took charge of it himself."

A little boy twelve years old once stopped at a country tavern and paid for his lodging and breakfast by sawing wood, instead of asking it as a gift. Fifty years later, the same boy passed the same little inu as George Pashody, the banker.
