The Dangers of Trusteeship.

The proverbial danger attendant upon cting as trustee upon an estate has lately eccived another very striking illustration by the final decision in a chancery case in England. It seems that a gentleman of the name of Palmer died in 1864, said when deciding the case, these very heirs would in all likelihood have followed the same course exactly if these shares had been at their own disposal. The ed his finding was that the clause in question could only be regarded as giving the trustees a limited discretionary power so as to prevent their hurriedly disposing of the property at a sacrifice, without at sell within a reasonable period.

Perhaps this is all fair and right in a legal point of view; but the decision, nevertheless, shows what a thankless and risky business it is for people to involve themselves in trusteeships to oblige and help the relatives of deceased friends. Too often they get a great deal of ill will, and sometimes while acting from the best of motives and with the most scrupulous uprightness, suffer, as in this con; serious iary loss. It is well for every such trustee to remember, also, that if he cousent to act, and allow matters to be illegal is done and any mismanayement proved, though he had no more to do with it than an unborn child. We have personally known some very distressing cases of this kind in which individuals of the most unimpeschable rectitude have P.L.S., and latter in charge of E.W. On two occasions recently, burglars had entered his store, and he determined to punish them should they make another attempt. This was the method Smith adopted. After making all the preparations he retired, but returned for something, forgot the trap, and on entering the door received the full charge in the lower limbs. About two hours later he was found by his friends, but he lived only long enough to make the explanation.
