Doctry

Yes, there is the old, old home?
The garden trim and neat,
The gamble roof of ancient chane,
The rustic wooden seat;
The very smoke, it curks aloft
As it was wont to de.
When years hoe, with heavy heart,
I bade my home adies.
The rustic stile on which I lean,
The fiship all round me spread;
The silver stream in yonder glade,
The trees shown my head;
the saven seem, the yellow gold,

The hedges thick and green, All tell'me that I'm back again In some familiar scene.

The little church whose old gray spire
Stands dark against the sky,
Now throws its shadow o'er the graye
Where boil my brothers lie;
And there's the tree I loved to climb,
And swing among its boughs;
The tree where happy lover's came
To whisper lover's voys.

How many, many weary years
Have passed since that glad time;
With shrinking feet I've often half
The hills of life to climb;
Still climb brave heart and do not fail;
Half way, O, never stop,
For though tis gloomy in the vale,
There's sunlight at the top.

The evening sun is setting red,
I cannot see things clear;
A trembling at my heart tells me
I must not linger here;
I'll pass the door, and lightly tap
Upon the window pane;
"Hi! mother, father, quek! come
Your boy is home again."

"Thank God! 'tis true, it is the lad O, who can tell their joy; With streaming eyes and grateful he They welcome back their boy, His manly beard and sailor's dress Delight their wondering eyes, While listening to his marvedous tale Of foreign lands and skies.

Far, far, into the happy night
They sit around the fire;
The father gazes on his son,
The son upon his sire;
Then with their hearts all full of joy.
Forget all sorrow and pain,
They give their thanks to Him who he
The wanderer home again.

Everybody thought I was trying a dangerous experiment; but I didn't pretend to suit everybody, so I simply suited myself. I was quietly to chutch with Chira Myers, and married has one glorious January morning, when the old St. Paul's was frinked with glittering inseles, and the brisk wind was freighted with the particles of fring mow, like a hastalige of diamonds on a fluidble quiek.

She was nineteen, and I was nine-and-thitry. She was as beautiful as a rose-bud; I was a rough old codger, sound a coough it heart, but, like a winter typle, unpromising on the exterior.

'In short, we were se unlike as May had Nortunber; and the good natured world shock its head and shid, " No good could come of such as unaqual match." But she said she loved us, and I believed like. Nobody could look into Chara's blue eyes and not believe her, you see.

The next day I mad: a will and be.

A Reverend gentleman of the name of Taylor lately resigned his charge in Giasgow on account of the United Presbyterian Synod fermitting congregations to employ instrumental music in public worship, in cases where members were united on the matter. Mr. Taylor is now publishing a series of papers on the subject. One of his arguments against instruments is rather original, and might be regarded by some as proving too much. He says musical instruments were not
