On entering the theaters or the music to his seat, pulls out his little brush and proceeds in the most matter-of-fact way proceeds in the most matter-of-fact way to arrange his hair, referring now and then to the small looking-glass on the back of the brush to admire the general effect. Even in the restaurants the same thing is done over the soup. The result is that one sees the among the younger cert arranged hair among the younger Germans. But the effect is spoiled when the thing forced upon him at arch 1st, NS one has the thing forced upon him at all times, and on all occasions finds himself in a gentleman's dressing-room everywhere he goes, just as one would not think so much of a pretty complexion, even if one previously knew it were artificial, if he saw the fair possessor applying the cosmetic. It is strange how such little things will affect one, but they do; and one is often compelled. in spite of himself, to form his opinions from little things. Of course when one says "all younger Germans" he does not mean every single one of them. For there are a few, even among the physically almost perfect Germans, who wear their bair a la Buffalo Bill. However, these are few in number and effeminate in body and mind, having a great deal of the esthetic and poetic in their na-tures. Their lily-white hands and pale faces offer a striking contrast to the brawny and ruddy appearance of their more fortunate and manly brothers. One cannot always account for one's prejudices, and I am free to confess that I cannot account for my prejudice against a man who parts his hair in the

One would not think of raising his hat to his intimate gentlemen friends every time he meets them on the street. But the Germane take it as a great breach of etiquette, if not a decided personal insult, if you pass them with simply "Good morning" or "How are you?" You must raise your hat and make a decidedly low bow. This would be a little inconvenient, but nothing worse, if you were only acquainted with a few gentlemen. But ds meets forty or fifty gentlemen in the course of an hour's stroll, and is compelled to go through the same hat-raising formula to each and every one of them, the thing becomes monotonous. This same effusiveness pervades all classes of society, and one sees old mes and boys saluting each other in the same manner. But one can see even more touching sights than this if he haunts the railroad stations and watches the departures and arrivals. In America kissing of friends and acquaintances is left to be monopolized almost entirely by the ladies; but over here the men take their share of the good thing—if good thing it may be called—and kins and hug each other on occasion in a way that is truly affecting.
