Charles Hill had been at work in the well blasting the rock with Barney Hodeins, and after paring a charge they ascended the ladder to await its discharge. The report was not heard, and thinking the fuse had not been properly adjusted, Hill went to the bottom of the well and lit a match to ascertain the cause of the delay. Immediately the fire ignited the powder and Hill was thrown up out of the hole a distance of nine feet when he was caught by tance of nine feet when he was caught by Holgins, who had him at once properly cared for. Hill's shoulders, hands, hips and face were burned in a terrible manner, but no bones were broken.

They immediately began to search and found him in six feet of water. He was taken out of the water as soon as possible, but life had already become extinct. On Sunday his remains were interred in the Ingoldsby cemetery.

He was followed to his last resting place by the largest procession of friends we
