The Brook. Alone I stand by the murmuring stream. Watching its flow through shadow and gleam. And looking I listen, an listening dream.

SOMETHING ABOUT EYES. It has been lately asserted that blue eyes do not sparkle; it is only the black that do that. But the gentle loveliness of blue eyes is not denied.

Probably no eye is without its attractions, no matter what the distance about it is. The color goes with the complexion, the tint of the face, and the hue of the hair, and usually complementary to those.

It would not make a blue-eyed girl prettier, whose complexion would naturally be delicate, and whose hair would be light, to change her eyes to black if that process could be accomplished.

The harmony of what the artists call the ensemble would be broken up by such a change and a similar damage would happen if a pair of black eyes were changed, in any particular case, to blue.

This compensatory character of a feature is strikingly shown by the fact that red hair—which we usually find all spoken of—is almost always accompanied by the purest and clearest complexion possible.

Another circumstance about eyes is, that except in very rare instances, we do not easily remember the particular color of those possessed by our acquaintances.

This is so well understood that at parties frequently a large number will go out and reappear with their whole faces covered, except their eyes, which are left wholly visible; those left behind are asked, with ludicrous results, to tell from the eyes alone the different members of the masked party.

And where many are so concealed it is never done with success, the guesses being, for the most part, widely at fault.

practised man relies on the language of the face. "There are eyes, to be sure, that give no more admission into the man than blueberries. Others are liquid and deep—well, that a man might fall into. They are asking eyes, asserting eyes, and eyes full of fate, some of good and some of sinister omen."

And there is much more which this writer has seen in and tabulated of the eyes. His friend and neighbor, Thor- oren, always believed in the popular proverb, which asserts that character as well as beauty is manifested by the eyes.

But we began this subject with a reference to blue eyes, and no other appeal to us so much in the way of attention. Many years ago that staid old periodical, the Westminster Review, started its readers by the publication of an elaborate essay written to prove that blue eyes were going out of fashion.

The writer offered an array of statistics which showed a tendency of those eyes towards a gradual elimination. If they were really decreasing rapidly, the time would soon come, of course, when they must cease altogether.

It was a frightful thought. But a quarter of a century has passed since the prediction was made, and no special scarcity of blue eyes is yet apparent. And we have faith to say that they will always exist.

Nearly 1,500 Europeans, drawing an annual salary of $2,000,000, are employed in the civil service of Egypt to the exclusion of natives. That's what the row is about.

A "fire-proof" theatre in Cleveland burned like a tinder-box. Mr. Lobel, of New York, has just had to pay $200 because he hired Miss Raven against her will. People who have been intending to write as soon to the effect that Mr. Lobel must have been a Raven himself, will notice that they have been headed off.

The first steamship for the American Quick Transit Line is being built at New York. She is to be known as the Meteor, and is to be a monster and what is termed a "turtle-back" steamer. Nothing is to be above the dome deck except the smoke-stacks, pilot house and signal staff. She will be built of wood, as she is intended principally as an experiment, and may suggest some improvements.

John Wamamaker's new residence at Cheltenham, Montgomery county, Pa., is the largest private residence in the state, except Ogontz, Jay Cooke's old home. Fine specimens of bituminous coal have recently been obtained at Point Loma, near San Diego, Cal., and it is believed that valuable deposits exist there.

Brute.—"Well, Ehoh, how did you make out?" Angel (under treatment for her voice).—"I didn't like it at all, and I don't see why the doctor finds it necessary to run me through so far that it seems as if he would touch my heart." Brute.—"Oh, he was probably trying to find the end of your tongue, my dear."

A scientist says that the thermometer and other instruments may undergo considerable changes during long heating. We have noticed this—especially in thermometers. That is what they are built for. A thermometer that didn't undergo a change during a long heating would be regarded as a fraud.—Horroratum Herald.

The author of the "Ingoldby Legends" had to tell a story of the complete disappearance of a wit of no inferior order by a message, politely delivered at a supper party by a little girl: "If you please, Mr. Jones," said the child, "mamma sends her compliments, and would be much obliged if you would begin to be funny."

"Yes," said Dugan Gilpin, "the peckers annoy me about to death. I wish I could invent some way to keep 'em out of my cracker barrels." "I'll tell you how," spoke up Amundah. "How?" "Keep your crackers in boxes." "That won't keep the rats away from 'em." "Oh, no; but it would keep 'em out of the barrels."

Barzani estimates his wealth at $10,000,000, but the genius who has devoted forty or fifty years of his life to circus posters and advertisements is perhaps a little given to exaggeration. A pair of cruel London parents tried to stop their girls from keeping late hours by cutting off the hair of the young ladies. The girls were unsmothered before a magistrate, who, after remarking that the old gentleman had no right to disfigure his daughters, bound him over to £20 to keep the peace with them and to wear their hair for three months.

In the vocation of fishing, during the past year, seventeen Gloucester (Mass.) vessels were lost and 200 lives were sacrificed. Of these men lost at sea, forty left widows, and sixty-eight children were bereft of their natural protectors. In the stress and strain of a seafaring life seventy-one men were captured or were driven from their crafts, and were carried ashore or rescued by passing vessels after incredible hardships. The total tonnage lost was $120,000, valued at $120,000, on which there was an insurance of $75,000. In 1882 the total losses were 115 lives, and twelve vessels valued at $73,700.

"Wife," said an up-town man to his spouse recently, "how many house plants shall you try to carry through the winter?" "Only this geranium, this rose-bud and this Jerusalem cherry tree—three in all." The husband made an entry in his diary in the morning and inquired: "But why do you ask?" "In order to know how much extra coal to order for the winter supply," was the cruel answer. "Judging from your ill-luck last winter I think I had better lay in about an extra ton apiece for each plant."

Judge Halliburton relates that when once traveling in the provinces a man thus explained to him how he was in the same profession as lawyers: "I am a wrecker. I am Lloyd's agent, and live on the misfortunes of others; so do you. When a vessel is wrecked it is my business to get her off, or to save the property. When a man is entangled among the shoals or quicksands of the law, your duty is similar. We are both wreckers, and therefore members of the same profession. The only difference is, you are a lawyer and I am not."

"Why are you in such a hurry to get home?" one Frenchman asked another who had recently arrived in New York and had already bought a ticket for the return trip. "Ah, my friend, I return that I may become a member of the Cabinet." "Indeed! What hope have you of that?" "They will have tried every other Frenchman by the time I get to Paris, and I must hurry to take my turn."
