PRIDAY, JUNE 4, 1886

Scraps of Philosophy Don't confide your griefs to others, Lock them close within your breast; Keep, when with the world you mingle, In advance, the foot's that's best,

Though the heart be well-nigh breaking, Wear a smile upon the lip; For will care to know your troublesall desert a sinking ship.

Fling them back contempt for scorn; Vulgar pride is linked with folly. Empty heads are highest born,

When a friendly neighbor fetches Bones to pick from some foul stew; Curb your tongue and guard it closely, Lest he carry one from you.

Unsought services, when proffered By the stranger, snave and kind, Can't be scrutinized too closely. He may have an axe to grind,

Sleep philanthropists who labor Gratis for mankind each day: Ever prompt with prayers to aid you, Always seem to make it pay,

Shun with loathing man or woman, Who, in little meanness skilled, Stabe with covert innuendoes, From a venomed tongue distilled,

Watching each unguarded moment, At unwary prey to bound; Every sense with malice quickened, Keen to make or break a wound,

Would you be contented, think not Of the few by fate more blessed; Cause your lot by those less favored, Whom misfortune's hand hath presse

For whatever way you travel, Climbing up life's weary hill, Pierced by thorns and torn by brambles, There are paths more rugged still.

Mr. E. Flood, superintendent; P. Barr, treasurer; J. Flood, librarian; Miss F. Grace, secretary; Mr. and Mrs. J. B. White, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. One who was counted on as a valuable accletant has, we are sorry to learn, been prevented by professional duties from taking any active part in the work. DANGEROUS tendencies were displayed on the part of some three or four persons to turn our Sabbath school of last week into a "hatlelyigh meeting," We think the parties concerned should be promptly secured before further damage is done.
