In Memoriam.

In remembrance of the late Mrs. Thomas

Our mother dear has passed away
From earth, to dwell in heaven;
The summons came, she could not stay,
Our earthly ties are riven.

Our family group is broken now, One vacant chair is there; An empty piace at our repeat Cives grief that we must bear.

Her smile it always cheer'd our way
And made our burdene light,
A shade has grown o'er the day
Since she has left our sight,

Her check it never naler grew
To warn us of decay,
Ent like the morning resolud pure
She calmly passed away.

Twas He who did our soule create.
That took her from our side;
And soon again we hope to meet.
In bliss beyond the tide,

The memories of her presence kind. Not soon will fade away. But they will live as long as mind. Throughout one endless day. Her gentle and of life went down As it behind a hill, Ant like a hidden morning star Her light is shining still.

And more so when in prayer; We pause beside her bedroom door, But no "Good-night" is there,

Can we forget that lighted brow, That the real our leaure hours; And the frosts of winter time and like the flowers.

undonheally give rise to the cry that the law was unequal. A rich man in a community where the sale of drink had been totally prohibited, would be able to stock his cellar and defy the prohibitionists. But a poorer man, who lived more on less from hand to mouth, and who was unable to free the expense of importing his barrel of veer, would have an important change forced upon his social arrangements by the opperations of the Act. Lunging the effect upon the popular community of a case in which a moderate drinker, sitting upon the bench as a magistrate, sentenced to punishment a working man who wanted to be a moderate drinker too, and who had tried, in morking man who wanted to be a moderate drinker too, and who had tried, to order to carry out his desire, to evade the prohibitory laws. The stump orator would be all in his glory in depicting the nufairness of John Smith being sent to prison because he wanted a glass of grog, and Ponsonby Smythe, after pronouncing this sentence, going home to his champagne and his port. Then again, in these days when the authority of the law is rong called in question, it is of inmense imperiance that, so far as possible, the law should have the moral sanction, or indeed could we bisme anyone because it did not have that moral sanction, or indeed could we bisme anyone because it did not have that moral sanction? When the majority of the learned and refined and clumded men of this country believe is moderate drinking, could we condems the plain workingman for refusing to one eye to sye with the testotellers, and being filled with indignation at the operation to which he was subjected? The feeling of recentment engendered in the mind of the honest lavourer who has drunk his place of beer or which y all his life as his father had done before him, when he found that his dimple and well-carned luxury had been forothy denied him, would be enough to bring in his mind the whole authority of the law into contempt. He would continue to believe, as his superiors in rank and clustation believed, that his moderate drinking was in no way wrong, and he would therefore regard the interference of the executive with his private his as unwarrantable importances which he would do his best to evide.

We have almostic apparent the extention of the life private his as unwarrantable importances which he would do his best to evide.

we have already carried this articule to a cufficient length, and we are unwilling to continue it further. But had we time and space, we would suggest many ways in which would be reformere might do much to ameliorate the evile of dirtuling without resorting to the proposed onto legislate for the improvement of the drink sold in this country, the harm much of it enesses, even when taken in modera ion, would be lessened, and the flery passions raised by the law and adulterated spirit so often pained off on the public, would be modified. And if the poverty, the home discomforts, and the general sense of joylessuess and misery, which drove so many to the temporary forgetiulness of intoxication, were removed by the progress of enlightening and have the proud and lasting sutle faction of knowing that it had not merely accept from the drink fiend by the coveratios of serfdom but had subdued it into usefulness by the herolem of manhood.

I venture to say that any who claims the larmers to be "a wealthy and money making class will not seek to prove it by lowering the above rate of wages.

Perhaps the better plan to arrive at facts would be to invite the farmers who for a term of years of experience could give the figures, showing to what extent their facts and figures may agree with those of the camp or mine. Advance.
