and he predicted that the concessoration for 1801 would show a plendid record in this respect. He throughly therefore, that it must be the duty of the Government to be very careful relative to the through open of our markets to the farmers of the United States.

The speaker then dealt trementally with some of Sir Richard Cartwright's figures relative to our trade with the United States, and showed that Sir Richard by using the McKinlev tariff in arriving at his calculations had given a fictitious value to them. For instance, he had stated that Canada had exported twelve million donese of egge last year, the duly on which was $040,000 and paid by our farmers, whereas all these eggs had gone to the States before the tariff came into operation and consequently there was no duly paid. (Laughter and chorse.) Sir Richard was evidently not very particular as to bie statistics and had evidently drawn largely upon his imagination. (Hear, hear.) That how, gentleman had sharply criticised the Finance Minister for stating that Canada had found a market for hay in Great Britain, and said that the country was simply experimenting in this direction. Last year Canada exported 10,000 tone of hay to Great Britain, or ten ship loads of 1,000 tone each. Surely that could not be considered an experiment. (Hear, hear.) Of a sumber of agricultural products mentioned by Sir Richard, he had considered an experiment. (Hear, hear.) Taking the Knight's own figures, they simply totalled up to five million dollars. Taking the Knight's own figures, they simply totalled up to five millions and a half, but apply to them the actual tariff rate—not Sir Richard's fictitions one—and the date on these articles simply amounted to $250,000. (Hear, hear and laughter.)

laughter.)

Under this head ine old question nafirstly arose as to who paid the duty. The Reformers used to contend that the The Reformers used to constend that the Canadian farmer paid the duty on goods they imported, but that on goods exported the duty was paid by the purchaser. Now, however, they had changed their case and insisted that the Canadian farmers paid the duty on their produce exported. But what did the resord show? Notwithstanding the McKinley tariff, the price of barley in Canada to day was higher than it was twelve months ago, showing clearly that the Americans themselves paid the duty on this article. With regard to the cattle trade it was very important that the Canadian markets should portant that the Canadian markets should not be opened to the United States. Under one present fiscal policy Canadian farmers obtained on an average $12 per head more for their cattle in Great Britain than in the country to the south of de, If the tariff walls were torn down the valuable privilege our exporters now en-joyed in reference to landing cattle in the arguments had been address by the Opposition during the budget debate.
