Coaling-Stations.

Director Iowa Experiment Station.

A most important matter, one of vital importance in the rebuilding of our navy, is that of coaling-stations. The policy of this government has has always been not to maintain outside of our own limits any colony or anything approaching to a colony. Our new navy will be composed of vessels dependent altogether upon their coal supply to enable them to move at all. Deprive one of our modern battle ships of her fuel, and she would be absolutely helpless, as she has no sail-area whatever. Eyen with ships of the class of the Philadelphia and the Newark, although they have a certain amount of sail-power, to depend upon it to any ex PUREST tent would reduce their cruising-radius to almost nil, and in time of war would annihilate their effectiveness either in defensive or offensive operations. At present writing the United States has a coalheap at Samoa and the privilege of buying coal at Honolulu, but we are entirely destitute of coaling-stations on the west coast of Central America. This lack of tacilities cost the government forty-five thousand dollars for coal used when the Charleston chased the Itata. The Baltimore paid twenty-five thousand dollars for one supply at one of the Chilian ports. The English plan is to keep a coal-hulk at all their principal coaling-stations; thus a British war-ship cruising from one naval station to another, no matter at what speed, is always sure of an abundant supply of Welsh cool of the best

West Indies, for the purpose of establishing a coaling station on our Atlantic seaboard. In 1867 Mr. Seward negotiated a treaty for the purchase of St. Thomas and St. John, but, although the people of the islands voted unanimously in fayor of the sale, the United States Senate rejected the treaty, and there the matter ended. It is high time some decisive action were taken in this regard, as at present the edifying spectacle is presented of our war-ships being compelled to barter for their fuel from port to port, undoubtedly paying an outrageous price for inferior material such as would seriously
