On March 23, 1587, Drake set sail under instructions to prevent or withstand such enterprises as might be attempted by Spain. He had hardly beinted his flag before timid counsels prevailed achore. Formal orders were sent after Drake to "lorbear to enter foreibly into any of the King's (of Spain) ports or havens." But Drake did not mean that any orders chould ca'ch him, and he put to sea. When the Council's message reached Plymouth, Drake's squadran was below the horizon. The Oa March 28, 1587, Drake set sail squadren was below the horizon. The squadron was below the horizon. The smessenger put after him in a pinnace, but failing in with a prize took it and put back, reporting that his pursuit had been balked by heavy weather. Drake's Vice-Admiral, whem he put in irons before the expedition was over, declared before his court-martial that the Lord Admiral had particularly warned Drake not to land. Drake cleared Cape Finisterre, weathered a gale of wind, after which a breeze came out fair and treeh, and he summoned his captains of board, lie was not the man to waste time speaking or hearing words; he did no more ing or hearing words; he did no more than shortly tell his officers that he meant ting or hearing words; he did no more than shortly tell his officers that he meant to attack immediately, and so dismissed them. This immediately disgusted the Vice Almiral, Borough, who ached to give his advice, and wanted detailed orders for the guidance of the separate chips. Like all great admirals, Drake probably believed the fewer and simpler the orders the better. He had but one to give: they were to follow him in and desiroy the shipping when they got there.

For Borough's caution there was some excuse, none for his conduct. The only channel led under the guns of the old Cadiz into an outer and an inner harbor. The defences were not formidable, being mostly batteries buil. fifty years before. Much of he: harbors was so occupied by shoals that the English ships could not manecurre without a harbor pilot, while the water was ideal for the evolution of the Spanish galieys, of which dozens lay there, as Drake knew. Bg all the rules of war, on which Borough was the great authority in the service, to attack without the most claborate precautions was medness. But Drake was hore to break rules. In value Borough pleaded for waiting at least until nightfall. Drake would not intend. The enemy was before him; his authority was in his pocket; the wind held fair; and, to Borough's disgust at four o'clock in he afternoon he stood in.

As he opened the harder there before him at the shore end of the town some sixty sail ships, and under the second battery were a crowd of caravel and small barques. As Deake's fire upon the galleys declared his purpose, the harbor became a some of terror and confusion. Everything that could get way on her charried for such shelter as seemed available. Ten galleys put boldly out from under the first battery and bore down upon Drake's dream. But he was not to be frightened. Leaving his semed marchanisms to take the halpless vessels in hand with the fore warphips he definally me the Spanish attack. Passing acress the course of the advantage galleys he received. ope delles

The rest plundered and given to flames. Borough now wanted to put to man, but Deake would not listen to his caseling. Great as was the destruction, he was still unsatisfied. He had another exploit in mind and he ordered his caphe was still unsatiched. He had another exploit in mind and he ordered his captains to their ships, with orders not to move unless he did.

ed, and Borough's dismay moved the Bonaventure still further in and came to anchor among the rearmost merchantinum. In the inner harbor lay a aplendid vessel twienging to Santo Cruz himself, the commander of the armada that was forming. This he resolved to take regardless of the Spanish galleys, and rapidly organizate a stetilis of pinnaces and boats, which on the flood tide he led in person with the Merchant Royal to cut her cat. Borough put after him and found him, after the great prize had been taken, back aboard the Bonaventure. There, as Drake testified, Borough began "in trembling sort" to point out the danger of the Spanish galleys emerged from their shelter to attack him, and Drake had to come to his receus. Borough contined his retreat to the mouth of the harbor, when he anchored. He said afterward that his purpose was to protect the rest of the first from any attack that might be made from the tota. For this purpose his position was well chores, and for the time being Drake accepted the extense. He have that Borough was not personally pushing antical Santa Cruz's galleen.

The damage done to the enemy was near $4,000,000, reckened at to days equivalent. Satisfied at last, Drake prepared to put to sea, but now the wind fell. He had to remain where he was, exposed to all the devices the Spaniards could invent to destroy him. He wrote home begging for anthority to hold the place permunently. Before answer came he had taken the King's own carack, with cargo valued close upon $5,000,000, modern computation. In all those wars there was no campaign to match this here was no campaign to match this navel one of 1387. "The truth is," wrote the Venetian ambassador, "that he has done so much damage on the coast of Spain alone that though the King were to obtain a most signal victory against him he would not recover the one half the loss he has suffered." not to be. The wretched diplomatists were at their bungling wore, and Drake's squadron was dispersed and his gallant, trained seamen paid off. Drake's bitterness can be understood—a bitterness chared by his ecuntrymen of to-day who have to write the history of those times. The ambassadors then in England cannot find language to paint the vaciliation and spasmodic ineptitude of a policy that threw to the winds the advantage gained by the great Tudor seaman, and ended by imperilling the existence of England, which was to be saved later on by the valor and skill of there same seamen.

When all the vensions and faterest are paid the amount will be swellen to twelve bilition dellars. The Troy, N.Y. Press points to three legacies left by that war over a generation ago. The first is a pension list of one hundred and fifty million dellars a year, a tax of two dellars per head on the total population of the United States. The second is the bondholding class, whose money was loaned to carry on the wer. Third, the numberless army of tramps, largely the direct outcome of the wer.

Barlin, May 21.—Public attention in this country has temporarily been diverted from the war between Spain and the United States to the significant speech recently made at Birmingham by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the British Secretary of State for the Colonies. The bulk of opinion since the text of the speech has been available corresponds to the utterances of Prince Biamarck on the subject telegraphed to the Associated Press on Wednesday last, when the former Chancellor was quoted as asping.—"The importance thereof depends upon whether Mr. Chamberlain's private opinions, are those of the British Government. Newsboys Belling More Than Papers

A traveler on a Massachusetts train was recently attracted by the suspicious conduct of a boy, who appeared to be carrying on a business sub rosa with the young men passengers as he made his regular tours through the train with books, papers and contectionery. Finally the newsboy began a whispered conversation with a boy traveler, about fifteen years of age, who sat directly in front of the one who was watching the affair, and often a few moreovers the newsboy pulled. after a few moments the newsboy pulled out a book from under his pile of papers and offered it to the boy passenger. "Is there a man in all the audience," demanded the speaker on woman's rights, fisrcely, "who has ever done anything to lighten the burden resting on his wife's shoulders? What do you know of woman's work? Is there a man here," she continued, folding her arms and looking over her audience with superb scorp, "that has ever got up in the morning." "that has ever got up in the morning, leaving his tired, worn-out wife to her leaving his tired, worn-out wife to her slumbers, gone quietly down stairs, made the fire, cooked his own breakfast, sewed the missing buttons on the children's shoes, darned the family stockings, soured the pais and kettles, cleaned and filled the lamps, swept the hitchen, and done all this, it necessary, day after day, uncomplainingly? If there is tuch a man in this audience, let him stand up. I should like to see him." And far back in the hall a mild-looking man in spectacler, in obedience to the summore, timidly arose. He was the husband of the elequent speaker. It was the first chance he had ever had to assert himrelf.
