In Brooklyn, they call them the "Lady Barbers," says the New York Times, and presumably they are very proud to have such unique individuals within the borough limits. They have reason to be proud of them in a way, for they are nealthy, wholesome, aitractive looking young women, said not to talk to customers, but that is a libel on both their when they are engaged in their professional work they may be seen chatting with genuine barber-like vivacity though it is possible that they use discretion in the use of conversational gifts.

There is nothing perticularly unique in being a lady barber, though the profession is one that, for obvious reasons, is not overcrowded by feminine artists. There have been lady barbers in Wash ington for several years, adorning Pennsylvania avenue wish their eign and apparently doing a prosperous business, and there are others in other parts of the

But the interesting point about the Brooklyn feminine tonsorial artists is that much vanuted "leminine touch," which they have given to the establishment which they honor with their presenc). This is the rocking chair, and it is a truly unique feature in the barber shop. It is used by the patrons during busy hours but from about the middle of the afternoon until toward evening passers by can see two rocking chaire drawn up near the door occupied by two plump female figures, each rocking back and forth cheerfully with white lace trimmed apron strings figing in the breeze thus created, while a third lemate figure is ensconced in another "f minize touch," a big easy chair before the window. It is a sight to convert the seoffer. No pessimist, let women adopt whatever manly profession she will, she may even become a barberess, but she will never lose her feminicity, it she has no other means of showing it than with a rocking chair and a flattering apron string.

A Guide's Heroic Act

London, Sept. 18.—The season's record of Alpine fatalities is appailing. This week has added several to the list. It also brings one of the most splendid stories of herolam ever told. Professor Nasse, well known in Brilin as the assistant of Prolessor Bergman, and Dr. Boreahrdt, with two guldes, the four men roped together, were crossing the Piz Belne over a snow bridge, which was considered safe by the guides. The bridge gave way and the leading guide and Professor Nasse fell into a crevacee. Nasse had the rope around his chest and bung to mid air.

A half-hour later, to relieve this intolerable strain, the leading guide out the topbetween himself and Professor Nasse, and disappeared into the depths.
