Some of the eastern investors in the desert lands and builders of schools and court houses and waterworks have lately been looking over their properties. An agent who has been riding through several counties in western Kansas describes what he saw in the United States Investor. He found in the towns of Woodsdale, Moscow, Springfield and Fargo eighteen people, the entire population. In 1890 these towns had a plation of 1,100. The departed inhabitants left villages with costly school buildings. The correspondent says of the situation in another town: 'Hughton has three families out of the 400 that used to be there. Nine children go to the $10,000 school house, and there is standing, like a monument of folly, a waterworks system that cost some eastern plutocrat $36,000. The town never paid a cent of principal or interest on all this and never will."
