PROF. MARSH'S LABORS.

(London Times.)

At the meeting of the Zoological society last week, among the papers read was one by Prof. Huxley on the application of the laws of evolution to the arrangement of the vertebrata, and more particularly mammalia. The illustrations adduced were those of the history of the horse, principally, so far as is known, from the work of Prof. Marsh on the "Eccenes of North America." The announcement of the paper had drawn together an unusually large attendance, as it was expected that the marshaling of the facts in Prof. Huxley's hands would have great interest in practically substantiating the theory of evolution, which, though foreshadowed by others, took practical shape in the work of Darwin twenty-one years ago. He has been visiting Ashtonunder-Lyne recently, and observed in a church-yard on the Manchester road a greenstone boulder used as a tombstone over the grave of the son of an alderman of that borough. This was the first instance where he had seen a boulder so employed, but it was put to a purpose where it may not only be preserved but exhibited to the public.
