Many a long year ago three or four regiments of Russian soldiers were encamped on all Europe." a flat sandy plain upon the shore of the Gulf of Finland, not far from a new town which had just been built at the mouth of the river Neva, and called St. Petersburg. The sun was beginning to set, and the men, having finished their marching and exercising, were having a rest after the day's work or beginning to get ready their supper.

Most of them were strong and sturdy fellows who looked as if they could stand a good deal of hard work, and hard fighting too, before giving in. But they certainly did not wear a very soldier-like appearance, for all that; they moved heavily and clumsily, and handled their muskets as if they had been more used to ploughs and spades than weapons of war.

But as they were now, they made a poor figure enough; and so, no doubt, thought a big red-haired man in Russia uniform, who, with his arms folded on his broad chest, and a scornful smile on his face, was watching half a dezen of them light a
