Run Along Now.

The evening was bitterly cold. Two children-a boy with a manly face, and an expression of matured concern, as though someone had ever been dependent on him, and a pale faced little girl-wandered around the sereets of a Western city. They had been left by an immigrant train, having fallen asleep in the barn-like waiting room, and, owing to the hurry incident upon departure, no one thought of them. They begged the station-keeper to allow them to remain by the fire, but he discredited their story-declared that they had not been left by a train; only "hanging around" to steal something, Everybody hurried along. No one had a kind look for the waifs. They went into the warm corridor of a hotel.
