street scenes, showing throngs of men and girls entering and emerging from the doorways, were obtained without difficulty, for only a second's exposure of the lens, like the flash of a dark lantern, was required in each case. Sixty of these were made without attracting any attention. Then he undertook the more delicate job of interior photographing. He got eighteen covert shots from the galleries and private boxes of the Haymarket, Sans Souci, Prospect, Alhambra, and Coffee's, all in the region of retail shopping.
