Australian Creameries.

We take from a recent letter of the London Times's special correspondent in Australia, the following description of the working of the Victorian creameries and factories: "They are all conducted on similar principles, and to see one is to see the system at work. In the early hours of the morning milk-carts arrive from the neighboring farms. The milk is still almost warm when it is received upon a shaded platform and poured into the great vat and strainer, from which it runs out into the separator in the building behind. From these a stream of yellow cream is perpetually pouring into vessels waiting to receive it, while the skim milk goes into a tank, whence it is pumped out again through a tube, which looks not unlike the hose of a fire engine, to the line of waiting carts. Every man when he has delivered his new milk, fills his empty cans with the milk from which all the cream has been removed, and takes it back to use for any purpose he may please. The cream alone is retained, and in a creamery nothing more is done. The cream is then forwarded to the factory to be dealt with. In the factory the first process is to let the cream ripen in the proper temperature, and for this purpose ice-making plant forms a part of the plant of every factory. The whole establishment is cooled by pipes filled with iced brine, and heat is excluded by charcoal walls, and with a thermometer showing 106 degrees in the shade outside, churning was going on, on the day of my visit to Euroa, at the correct dairy temperature of 52 degrees. Twenty-four hours usually brings the cream to the right condition. In some factories, in order to secure absolute uniformity of the material from which butter is made, the contents of the cream vessels are thoroughly mixed in large tanks and, if necessary, slightly diluted with hot water to get rid of lumps. From these tanks the cream is pumped into big wooden churns capable of turning out five hundred pounds of butter at a time. The butter-milk is strained from the churns and runs through an open pipe to a tank outside the building. The butter, being taken with wooden spades from the churn, is laid upon revolving tables which turn under corrugated wooden rollers. Here, under plentiful sluicings of iced water, it is worked and salted, and from the tables it is either worked by a wooden machine constructed for the purpose into pats for local consumption, or removed directly to the packing-room, where it is put into fifty-six pound cases for export. Refrigerating vans on all the railway lines take it to a refrigerating chamber in Melbourne, where it is examined and passed by the Government inspectors, and thence is goes on ice to its port of delivery in another hemisphere. From the time the cow is milked under an Australian gum tree until the butter reaches London it is never touched by hand. The whole of the operations are conducted by machinery."

Drove From Kansas to London, Ont.

LONDON, Ont., May 19.—The Advertiser says: A waggon-trip of 1100 miles in the spring of the year is not an over-pleasant experience, so Mr. & Mrs. John McPherson say. They arrived in town yesterday in a four-wheeled canvas caravan, and had driven all the way from Wyandotte, Kansas. Their vehicle was "stained with the variation of each soil between Kansas and Ontario. The mustang ponies attached to the rig, though hardy little beasts, show signs of that "tired feeling," which is not to be wondered at after a continuous trip of nine weeks' duration. The McPhersons formerly lived near Tilsonburg, Ont. They left for Kansas, along with Thousands of other Canadians, but did not make things go, and took this unusual means of returning to their own home. They were often delayed by storms and often by well-intending persons directing them wrongly. At night they slept in the woods, their mustangs tethered and their faithful dog on guard. Their worst experience on the whole trip was a cyclonic one, and Ypsilanti, Mich., was the scene. It looked as if a Kansas cyclone had followed them almost to the borders of Uncle Sam's domains to give them a helping hand out. Considerable damage was done to their outfit by this cyclone, but, after repairs, they continued on their way. Mr. McPherson intends settling somewhere in Middlesex.
