An Old Murder Confessed.

The Orillia Packet says: "Old residents remember the mystery connected with the disappearance of a fur dealer between Orillia and Penetanguishene, when the settlement was young. Major Wilson, of Sault Ste. Marie, told the Packet, on Monday, that he read in the New York Spectator the dying confession of Samuel Lobb, executed for murder in that State. Lobb had been a teamster in this district, and in 1837-38 served in Major McGrath's troop of Lancers. Prior to his execution he confessed that he had been engaged to convey a fur buyer who came from the United States, on his way to Penetanguishene, from Orillia to Coldwater. Knowing that the man had considerable money on his person, Lobb determined to gain possession of it. He therefore placed a spade in his waggon. The passenger asked what it was for, and was told that it would be required to repair mud holes in the road. Near Bass Lake, at a spot where one could see a long distance in both directions, Lobb got out of the waggon, struck the passenger over the head with the spade, and repeated the blows until his victim was dead. Lobb took all the dead man's effects, stripped the body, buried it in one hole in the centre of the road, and his clothes in another. He then proceeded to Coldwater. Subsequently there was a good deal of talk concerning the disappearance of the "peddler," his friends in the States tracing him, as they supposed, to Coldwater, where it was believed he had gone on to Penetanguishene with two Indians. Lobb went into horse dealing and other business, and finally drifted to "York State," where he committed the crime which led to his execution. The body was discovered by men engaged in road-work, and was buried near by. The grave is known still as that of the "peddler" who so mysteriously disappeared, and whom Lobb was afterwards suspected of having murdered."

No Excuse for a Pardon.

In Quebec wealth apparently is more powerful than charity. The latter creeth a multitude of sins, but the former wipes them out. Damare Laframboise, a blood-thirsty ruffian, was sentenced five years ago to fifteen years in the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. While in that institution he attempted to murder a guard. Now he has been left $25,000 by a sweetheart, and behold the would-be murderer and robber becomes a subject of interest, and the efforts of a certain class of philanthropists are to be directed towards obtaining his release. The possession of $25,000 has transformed the man's character. He is no longer a wild beast to be confined behind bars and stone walls, a menace to life and property. He is an unfortunate individual who will make a useful member of society. He has a $25,000 halo of respectability around him, and his brutal instincts and immoral degradation have entirely disappeared.

All this and more is to be pointed out to the Minister of Justice at Ottawa in a petition which doubtless will be signed by clergymen and women. It will be shown that Laframboise was the victim of circumstances, and that when he attacked the guard the latter had aggravated him. Besides, he was not the possessor of $25,000 at that time. No doubt this gentleman will be released, and we shall hear soon that he is widely known for his piety and charity. In the meantime we sneer at the Americans and say they worship the almighty dollar. We do more. We make a moral sponge of it.—Toronto News.

A baby carriage, designed especially for those who live in flats, which can be folded together, so that one person can handily carry it up and down stairs, is a New York invention.

Since it was announced that the Prince of Wales appeared at a public function in a white hat, the hat stores of New York have been depleted of headgear of that color by the Gotham Anglo-maniacs.

Amelia Sternecker has invented a fender for trolley cars which will be given a trial by the San Francisco electric railways. She is only 17 years of age, but has had a passion for machinery since her early childhood.

J. P. Chapman, of Cassopolis, Mich., is the "cynosure of all eyes" wherever he goes. He hitches his white trotting dog Joe with a white Shetland pony, rides in a white sulky, wears a white suit himself, and uses white reins.
