GLADSTONE'S STATUE.

A statue to Gladstone has recently been placed in Westminster Abbey on the spot marked for it years ago by Dean Stanley. It occupies the last vacant place for a standing figure in the north transept. The London Times describes the statue. It was made by Mr. Brock of the Royal Academy, and is a marble figure on a marble pedestal, which at present contains no inscription. On one side is the statue of Sir Robert Peel, on the other, that of Lord Beacons-The aisle is called the "Statesmen's Aisle," and is near the pulpit. Gladstone stands in the robes of a doctor of civil law of Oxford, with his face turned slightly to the left. The likeness is good. There is no ceremony of unveiling monuments which, like this, are erected by the authority of Parliament. No display is necessary to call attention to the honor which the nation pays its great man.

A RATIFIED CATASTROPHE

It was in the cool of the evening, and the inhabitants of the village were beginning to think of retiring, when suddenly a piercing scream rang out, and a terrified woman rushed into the road.

"Fire! fire!" she shricked. The village stalwarts were on the spot at once, and dashed into the house. But there was no sign anything approaching the destructive element.

"Where's the fire?" they asked from the window. "Oh, I didn't mean fire! L-I
