Society and the Baby.

Society.—I see, baby, that your mother has been obliged to leave you and go to work, and this gives me the opportunity I wanted. You must know, baby, that it is my custom and duty to pass doom and sentence upon all babies of your age and condition of life; it is necessary to maintain what we call the social equilibrium; if you live you will of course understand this much better by and by.

You are a fine little baby, with your sleepy-looking, half opened eyes, your close folded hands and five pink-headed toes. Nature, the old democrat, has done her duty by you; but she and I fell out long ago; she is eternally conspiring against the social equilibrium, and, while her models and combinations are infinite in number, she would fain make all her productions practically equal in their needs, and it requires all my vigilance, baby, to combat her tireless persistence. Yes, you are a fine baby, but you were born in a narrow, mean cottage and your parents are poor. The chances are many to one that you will end your life in the same social condition as that in which you began it. There is a fool proverb which runs, "There's room at the top"; but it's a snare and a lie, and some even think that, were it true, the scramble to get there would not be very ennobling. I offer no opinion, baby; but, if you could understand, I would point you to the fact that on top of the billion dollar steel pyramid there was not standing room for two: Morgan or Carnegie must step down. They are on the top and the chances for such as you grow slimmer every day. Don't think, baby, that in giving my award, I am consciously or unnecessarily cruel. I am not; but, as I said before, I must maintain, as long as I can, the social equilibrium. In justification I could point out to you the scripture and a thousand historic precedents, all of which are much more pleasant and respectable than agitating and seeking social justice according to the methods prescribed by our modern dreamers.

But you know nothing of these things, baby. Be thankful, and be not too eager for the day of your full understanding; none know they are slaves until they see their chains. But I must be going, baby; you have kept me a little longer than usual over a function of this kind. You are a very interesting baby, but I see you are beginning to pule and your little hand goes to your mouth; and I see too in the distance your mother returning; her hand, too, is at her breast. I understand it all; I must begone, but not before my decree is given, which is, that from the year of consciousness to the end of your mortal life you shall toil ever with care at your right hand and poverty at your left! Good-bye, baby. —STONEHENGE.

The Basis of Ownership.

The only moral or ethical basis for the ownership of any thing by an individual is that he produced it by his own labor.

All land was produced by nature. Past generations had no moral right to vest the ownership of any part of it in individuals with the power to devise or sell it to other individuals. Succeeding generations have the same moral right to the earth that past generations had. Since the ownership of the land passed into the hands of a few by the action of former generations, millions of the present generation are deprived of its use unless they pay tribute to the owners.

Unless the present owners can show a complete chain of title from nature down to themselves, there is a fatal defect in their title. No lapse of time can correct a flaw or render moral to-day an ownership which, through ignorance or force, was immoral in its beginning. Nor is the ownership of other forms of capital by its present owners any more moral.

The mines and quarries were opened, the houses, shops, stores, factories, machinery, railway, the telegraph and telephone were all built by the working class. The working class alone has a moral right to own them.

Since the individual ownership by members of the working class would have the same effect upon the non-owners that the individual ownership by capitalists has, it is necessary to abolish individual ownership and to substitute public ownership.

Only by this change in the ownership of land and the machinery of production can the workers of this generation and of all the succeeding generations be assured of equality of opportunity to use the land and the machinery, the assurance of freedom from compulsory tribute, the assurance of receiving the full value of their labor.—Peoria Socialist.

Babies Born Into Slavery.

The searchlight has rarely been turned so relentlessly on the amazing conditions under which thousands of baby "hands" earn their living in the city of London as soon as they can talk. Mrs. Mackirdy, in her book "Baby Toilers" published by Hutchinson & Co., gives to the world the terrible heritage of English children who are born into slavery. "The home workers seldom leave their rooms" says the writer, who goes on to tell of three baby toilers who help to make elastic belts at five farthings, or often three half-pence per dozen. One of them, aged 5 years, helped to stretch the belts and hold them taut. The whole family work from twelve to fourteen hours per day on tea and stale bread. "Babies born into slavery," she describes them. A whole family occupies a single room. In a corner of many such a room a mangle may be found, and at this dreary machine from dawn to dark little children toil, earning perhaps a penny an hour. The little backs are bent; the arms grow twisted, and terrible eyestrain is the result, for the terrible muscular strain put forth by these tiny bodies causes the eyes to protrude. Sometimes the little ones are packed off to school with aching bodies and dull eyes, to pick up such knowledge as they can. But almost to the hour of starting and again on their return they take up the struggle with the mangle. Exactly the same kind of a story is told of baby "erranders," staggering under extraordinary bundles; baby needle workers and box makers—the story of hunger, weariness, illness and often ill-treatment. "And the children," says Mrs. Mackirdy, "are the heritage of the foremost nation of the world."

Everything For Sale.

The effect of capital is to make a commodity of everything. Honor and virtue, like pig-iron and potatoes, are measured only by their price and estimated only by their earning capacity. Everything is made for sale, and, as a result, lawmakers sell their laws to the highest bidder on the same basis as shoes might be sold by shoemakers. Money is invested in politics by the wise man of business only for the purpose of drawing the expected dividends. The remedy for this is in a system of industry where things are made for use and not for sale.—Appeal to Reason.

When the captains of industry become past masters in the art of robbery and jobbery, it is high time to reduce them to the ranks.
